2. The plant which bears this fruit.—High cranberry, or bush cranberry. See cranberry.
cranberry-gatherer (kran'ber-i-gav'it'er-er), n. An implement, shaped somewhat like a rake, used in picking cranberries.

cranberry-tree (kran'ber-i-trê), n. The high or bush cranberry, Viburnum Opulus, a shrub of North America and Europe, bearing soft, red, globose, aerial drupes or berries. The cultivated form, with sterile flowers having enlarged calices, is known as the ornamental cranberry.

crance (kran), n. Naut., an old name for any boom-iron, but particularly for an iron cap attached to the outer end of the bowsprit, through which the jib-boom passes.

cranch (kranch), v. t. Same as cranch.

Cranchia (kranch'i-â), n. [NL. (Leach), Cranch, an E. proper name.] The typical genus of the family Cranchiidae.

cranchiid (kranch'i-id), n. A cephalopod of the family Cranchiidae.

Cranchiidae (kranch-i'î-dê), n. pl. [NL., cf. Cranchia + -idae.] A family of acetabuliferous staves of a cask or barrel in which the edge of the head is inserted.—3. A cooper's tool for cutting a cross-groove in staves for the head of a cask. It resembles a circular plane.

Cooper's Cross.

croze (kröz), v. t.; pret. and pp. crozed, pp. crozing. [croze, n.] 1. To make a croze or groove in, as a barrel.—2. In hat-making, to re-fold (a hat-body) so that different surfaces may in turn be presented to the action of the felting-machine.

crozier, crozier (kröz'hér), n. [ME. crozier, crocor, croyeur, croyeur, a bishop's pastoral staff, a crozier, lengthened (with -er) from croz, crozine, croce, a bishop's pastoral staff, a crozier: see cross.] Often referred, erroneously, to crucifix, which is only remotely connected.] 1. A staff about 5 feet long, ending in a hook or curve, or, in the case of an archbishop's crozier, surmounted by an ornamented cross or crucifix, borne by or before a bishop or archbishop on solemn occasions. The staff is hollow, commonly gilt, and highly ornamented. Early croziers were exceedingly simple. The patriarch's staff bears a cross with two transverse bars, that of the pope one with three. See patriarchal cross, processional cross, papal cross, under cross. Also called cross-staff.

Crozier.

2. From tomb of Archbishop Warham, Canterbury, England, a from drawing in British Museum.

His (the Bishop's) Episcopal staffe in his hand, bending round at the toppe, called by us English men a Crozier.

But instead of a parliament, the Lord Deputy summoned an ecclesiastical assembly, in which the rival croziers of Armagh and Dublin, of the Primate of all Ireland and the Primate of Ireland, encountered one another in his presence.

R. W. Dixon, Hist. Church of Eng., xix.

24. One who bears the crozier or the cross; a cross-bearer.

The canon law that admitteth the crozier to bear the cross before his archbishop in another province.

Unfinished, Descrip. of Ireland, an. 1811.

3. [cap.] In astrum, a constellation, the Southern Cross. See crux, 2.

croziered, croziered (kröz'hér), a. [crozier, crozier, + -ed.] Bearing or entitled to bear a crozier: as, croziered prelates.

crozzle (kroz'z), n. [E. dial. also crozill; cf. prozzle, v.] A half-burnt coal.

The spear-head bears marks of having been subjected to a hot fire, the point especially having been burnt to a crozzle.
N. and Q., 7th ser., III. 422.

crozzle (kroz'z), v. t.; pret. and pp. crozzled, pp. crozzling. [cf. crozzle, n.] To burn to a coal; char; coke.

Some of the coal is of a crozzling or coking nature.
Ure, Dict., I. 523.

crucis, n. Latin plural of crux.

crucial (kröz'hi-ál), a. [*cf. F. crucial, < L. as if *crucialis, < crux (cruxo), a cross: see crux*.] 1. Having the form of a cross; transverse; intersecting; decussating: as, a crucial incision.—2. In anat., specifically applied to two stout decussating ligaments in the interior of the knee-joint, connecting the spine of the tibia with the intercondyloid fossa of the femur.—3. Decisive, as between two hypotheses; finally disproving one of two alternative suppositions.

This meaning of the word is derived from Bacon's phrase instantia crucis, which he explains as a metaphor from a finger-post (crux). The supposed reference to a judicial "test of the cross," as well as that to the testing of metals in a crucible, which different writers have thought they found in the expression, are unknown to as learned a lawyer and a chemist as Bacon and Boyle. These supposed derivations have, however, influenced some writers in their use of the word.

It is true that we cannot find an actually crucial instance of a pure morality taught as an infallible revelation, and so in time ceasing to be morality for that reason alone.
W. K. Clifford, Lectures, II. 227.

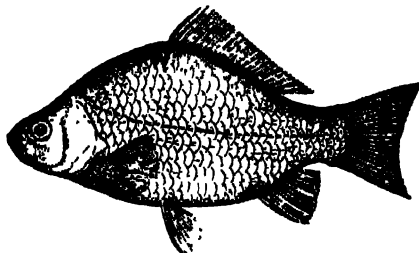

It is these thousand millions that will put to a crucial test the absorbing and assimilating powers of Christianity.
Quarterly Rev., CLXXII. 143.

4. Of or pertaining to a crucible; like a heated crucible as a utensil of chemical analysis.

And from the imagination's crucial heat
Catch up their men and women all a-flame
For action.
Mrs. Browning, Aurora Leigh, v.

5. Pertaining to or like a cross as an instrument of torture for eliciting the truth; excessively strict and severe: said of a proceeding of inquiry. [Rare.]—Crucial ligaments. See def. 2.

crucian, crucian (kröz'shian), n. [An accom. form, with suffix -ian, = D. karus (Kilian) = Sw. karussa, Dan. karusse = G. karussche, formerly karüsch, also karas; appar. < F. carassin (> also the NL. specific name carassius), a crucian, = It. carassino, a crucian, < L. coracinus, < Gr. κοραίνος, a fish like a perch (so called from its black color), lit. a young raven, dim. of κόραξ, a raven: see coracine, Corax.] A short, thick, broad fish, of a deep-yellow color, the Carassius carassius, or German carp, of the family Cyprinidae. It differs from the common carp in having no barbels at its mouth. It inhabits lakes, ponds, and sluggish rivers in the north of Europe and Asia, and has been found in the Thames in England. It is an excellent food-fish. Also called Prussian carp. A variety is known as C. gibelio, a name, however, also applied to the true crucian. See carp.

Crucian-carp (Carassius carassius).

crucian-carp (kröz'shian-kärp), n. A book-name of the fish (carassius carassius or vulgaris, the crucian).

Crucianella (kröz'si-ä-nel'ä), n. [NL., dim. < L. crux (cruxo), a cross: so called from the arrangement of the leaves.] A rubiaceous genus of herbs, natives of the Mediterranean region, with slender funnel-shaped flowers. C. stylata is sometimes cultivated in gardens under the name of oromarrort.

They vexed, tormented, and cruciated the weak consciences of men.
Bp. Bale, On Revelations, I. 5.

Silvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, I. 6.

cruciate<sup>1</sup> (kröz'shi-ät), a. [< L. cruciatus, tormented (ML. also marked with a cross, NL. also cross-shaped, cruciform), pp. of cruciare: see the verb.] 1. Tormented; excruciated. [Rare.]

Immediately I was so cruciated, that I desired . . . death to take me.
Sir T. Eliot, The Governour, II. 12.

2. In bot., having the form of a cross with equal arms, as the flowers of mustard, etc.; cruciform: applied also to tetraspores of red marine algae. See tetraspore.—3. In zool., crucial or cruciform; crossed or cross-shaped; specifically, in entom., crossing each other diagonally in repose, as the wings of many hymenopterous insects and the hemelytra of the Heteroptera.—Cruciate anther, an anther attached to the filament at the middle, and with the free extremities sagittate.—Cruciate prothorax or pronotum, in entom., a prothorax or pronotum having two strongly elevated lines or crests which approach each other angularly in the middle, forming a figure something like a St. Andrew's cross, as in certain Orthoptera.

cruciate-complicate (kröz'shi-ät-kom'pli-kät), a. In entom., folded at the ends and crossed one over the other on the abdomen, as the wings in many Coleoptera.

cruciate-incumbent (kröz'shi-ät-in-kum'bent), a. In entom., laid flat on the back, one over the other, but not folded, as the wings in most heteropterous Hemiptera.

crucially (kröz'shi-ät-li), adv. In a cruciate manner; so as to resemble a cross: as, "crucially parted," Farlow, Marine Algae, p. 151.

cruciation (kröz'shi-ä-shon), n. [< LL. cruciatio(-n-), < L. cruciare, pp. cruciatus, torment: see cruciate<sup>1</sup>, v.] 1. The act of torturing; torment; excruciation.

2. In bot., a plant of the order Crucifera.

Crucifera (kröz-sif'ä-rä), n. pl. [NL., fem. pl. (sc. L. plantar, plants) of crucifer: see cruciferous.] A very extensive natural order of dicotyledonous plants, of about 175 genera and 1,500 species, found in all countries, but least abundant in the tropics. They are annual or perennial herbs, with acrid or pungent juice, cruciform flowers, six stamens, of which two are shorter than the others, and mostly two-celled pods, either opening by two valves (rarely indehiscent) or transversely jointed. The order includes many important vegetables and condiments, as the cabbage, turnip, mustard, radish, cress, horseradish, etc. It furnishes also many favorite ornamental and fragrant flowering plants, as the stock and gilliflower, rocket, sweet alyssum, and candytuft. The larger genera are Arabis, Draba, Alyssum, Brassica, Nasturtium, Stenanthium, Erysimum, Helitropis, and Lepidium. The order is equivalent to the Linnean class Tetradymnea.

cruciferous (kröz-sif'ä-rä), a. [< NL. (ML.) crucifer, adj., bearing a cross (a later adj. use of

We have to do with a God that delights more in the prosperity of his saints than in the cruciation and bowling of his enemies. Bp. Hall, Soul's Farewell to Earth, § 7.

2. The state of being cruciate or cruciform; decussation.

cruciatory (kröz'shi-ä-tö-ri), a. [< LL. cruciatorius, < cruciator, a tormentor, < L. cruciare, pp. cruciatus, torment: see cruciate<sup>1</sup>, v.] Torturing.

These cruciatory passions do operate sometimes with such a violence that they drive him to despair.

Howell, Parly of Besatz, p. 7.

crucible (kröz'si-bl), n. [Formerly also spelled crucible; < ML. crucibulum, crucibulum, crucibulus, crucibulus, crucibulum, crucibulum, crucibulus, a melting-pot, also a hanging lamp; an accom. form (as if dim. of L. crux (cruxo), a cross; hence often associated with crucial, with ref. to a crucial test), < OF. cruche, an earthen pot, a crock: see crock<sup>1</sup>, and of crucet, cruce, and cruciole.] 1. A vessel or melting-pot for chemical purposes, made of pure clay or other material, as black-lead, porcelain, platinum, silver, or iron, and so baked or tempered as to endure extreme heat without fusing. It is used for melting ores, metals, etc. Earthen crucibles are shaped upon a potter's wheel with the aid of a templet or molding-blade, or under pressure in a molding-press. Metallic crucibles, especially those of platinum, are chiefly used in chemical analyses and assays.

Crucibles.

Some that deal much in the fusion of metals inform me that the melting of a great part of a crucible into glass is no great wonder in their furnaces. Boyle, Works, I. 490.

2. A hollow place at the bottom of a chemical furnace, for collecting the molten metal.—3. Figuratively, a severe or searching test: as, his probity was tried in the crucible of temptation.

Over the crucible of pain Watches the tender eye of Love.
Whittier, The Shadow and the Light.

Historians tried to place all the mythologies in a crucible of criticism, and hoped to extract from them some golden grains of actual fact. Keary, Prim. Belief, p. 2.

Crucible steel. Same as cast-steel.—Hessian crucible, a crucible made of the best fire-clay and coarse sand. It is used in the United States in all experiments where fluxes are needed. E. H. Knight.

crucifer (kröz'si-fér), n. [< LL. crucifer, n.: see cruciferous.] 1. A cross-bearer; specifically, one who carries a large cross in ecclesiastical processions.

At half-past ten the choir entered, preceded by the crucifer and followed by the . . . rector.
The Churchman, LIV. 513.

2. In bot., a plant of the order Crucifera.

Sw. krucifiks*, < ML. crucifixus, a crucifix, prop. neut. of LL. crucifissus, pp. of crucifigere, crucify: see crucify, v.] 1. A cross, or representation of a cross, with the crucified figure of Christ upon it. Crosses with a representation of the crucified Christ seem not to have been made previous to the ninth century; upon those made for similar purposes before this date is painted or carved at the intersection of the arms of the cross the Lamb with or without the crossed flag, the sacred monogram, or some other emblem. Byzantine crucifixes of bronze exist of as early date as the tenth century, in which the flat surface of the cross is decorated with enamel, having the sun and moon as emblematic of creation witnessing the crucifixion; in these the body of Christ is generally partly clothed with a garment indicated in colored enamel. Crucifixes are used in many ways in the devotions and ceremonies of the Roman Catholic Church, being conspicuously displayed in religious houses and other situations, and worn upon the person by ecclesiastics and others.

Bronze Crucifix.—Romanesque style, decorated with enamels.

The Crucifix, before which the barbarian bowed, was the emblem and witness of all-sufficing love. Channing, Perfect Life, p. 230.

No crucifix has been found in the catacombs; no certain allusion to a crucifix is made by any Christian writer of the first four centuries. Cath. Diet.

2. The cross of Christ; hence, the religion of Christ. Jor. Taylor. [Rare.]—Jansenist crucifix, a crucifix in which the arms of the Saviour hang down from the shoulders, instead of being outstretched. Lea.

The act of fixing to a cross, or the state of being stretched on a cross: an ancient Oriental mode of inflicting the death-penalty, applied in rare instances by the Greeks and more commonly by the Romans, by both Greeks and Romans considered an infamous form of death, and reserved in general for slaves and highway robbers. Among the Romans, the instrument of death was properly either a cross in the form now familiar, or the cross known as St. Andrew's; sometimes a standing tree was made to serve the purpose. The person executed was attached to the cross either by nails driven through the hands and feet or by cords, and was left to die of exhaustion or received the mercy of a quicker death, according to circumstances.

Specifically—2. The putting to death of Christ upon the cross on the hill of Calvary.

This earthquake, according to the opinion of many learned men, happened at our Saviour's crucifixion. Addison, Travels in Italy.

2. To draw or press into irregular folds; rumple; wrinkle.

Flague on him, how he has crumpled our hands!
Messinger and Field, Fatal Dowry, iv. 1.

My friend Sir Roger alighted from his horse, and expressing his pain to two or three that stood by him, they crumpled it into all shapes, and diligently scanned every wrinkle that could be made in it.

The crust of the earth, crumpled and fissured, has been, so to speak, perforated and cemented together by molten masses driven up from below.
Geddes, Geol. Sketches, II. 34.

II. *trans. To contract into wrinkles; shrink; shrivel.

It [aque-vitæ] bespeth the sinnes from shrinking the veins from crumpling.

trans. To crush with the teeth; chew with violence and noise: as, to crunch a biscuit; hence, to crush or grind violently and audibly in any other way.

A sound of heavy wheels crunching a stony road.
Charlotte's Brontë, Shirley, II. 14

Our wheels went crunching the gravel
Of the oak-darkened avenue.
Lowell, An Amber Picture

II. *trans. 1. To chew.—2. To act or proceed with a sound of crushing or crackling; produce a noise as from crunching anything.

The ship crunched through the ice. Kens crunch (krunch), n. [< crunch, v.] The act of crunching; the act of penetrating, forcing a passage through, or pressing against anything with a crushing noise.

What so frightfully old as we ourselves, who can, if we choose, hold in our memories every syllable of recorded time, from the first crunch of Eve's teeth in the apple?

crune (krön), v. Another spelling of crone.

crupper.] Same as crup<sup>3</sup>.

crupper (krup'ar), n. [< F. crupper, < croupe, the buttocks of a horse: see crup<sup>3</sup>.] 1. The buttocks of a horse; the rump.

Both gase strokes so sound,
As made both horses crupper knee the ground
Sir J. Harrington, tr. of Ariosto's Orlando Furioso, xvi. 100

2. A strap of leather which is buckled at one end to the back of a saddle, or to the saddle of a harness, and at the other passes by a loop under the horse's tail, to prevent the saddle from slipping forward. Also crupper. See out under harness.

Holding on for the dear life by the mane and the crup- per.
Thackeray, Barry Lyndon, xvii.

crupper (krup'ar), v. t. [< crupper, n.] To put a crupper on: as, to crupper a horse.

cruppa (krup'in), n. A dialectal (Scottish) variant of cropp, past participle of cropp.

crura, n. Plural of crus.

cruræ (krö-rä's), n. [N.L., < L. crus (crur-), leg.] The principal and middle mass of muscle on the front of the thigh, forming a part of the great extensor of the leg, inseparable from the lateral portions of the same muscle called vastus internus and vastus externus. These three muscles, or parts of one muscle, arise from most of the front and sides of the femur; and their tendinous parts unite with the tendon of the rectus femoris to embrace the patella or knee-cap, and thence proceed, as the so-called ligamentum patellæ, to insertion in the tuberosity of the tibia. The cruræ and the two vasti together compose the muscle called brachio extensor cruris; when the rectus is included therewith, the whole is known as the quadriceps extensor cruris. The cruræ proper of man is also called medialis, when the two vasti are known as the extensor and intercrureus respectively, and the rectus as the rectus cruris. See these words; also crur- cruræ, cruræ.

crural (krö'ral), a. [= F. Sp. Pg. crural = It.
crurale, < L. cruralis, < crus (crur-), the leg.]
1. Pertaining to the leg or hind limb: as, a crural artery or vein; the anterior crural nerves;
the crural arch, or Poupert's ligament.—2.
Pertaining to the leg proper, or crus, as distinguished from the thigh; enmial; tibial.—3.
Pertaining to the crura or peduncles of the brain.—4. Shaped like a leg or foot.—Crural arch, the ligament of the thigh. Also called crural arch, ligament of Poupert, etc.—Crural area. See area cruralis, under area.—Crural artery, the femoral artery.—Crural canal, the passage through which a hernial hernia passes. It lies on the inner side of the femur, between it and the crural sheath, and extends from the crural ring to the upper part of the saphenous opening. It is a quarter to a half inch in length.—Crural hernia. Same as femoral hernia (which see, under hernia).
—Crural nerve, the largest branch of the lumbar plexus, formed chiefly from the third and fourth lumbar nerves, with a fasciculus from the second, in the substance of the psoas muscle, and dividing into a large branch of nerves which supply all the muscles of the front of the thigh, excepting the tensor vagina femoris, and some other muscles, as the iliacus and pectineus, and also sending cutaneous nerves to the front and inner side of the thigh and to the leg and foot.—Crural pores, openings in the integument of the hind limbs of insects, as in the genus Sceloporus, which takes its name therefrom.
They are situated in the femoral, not the crural, segment of the limb. Also called femoral pores.

In the Sauri, the so-called crural pores lead into glands, which look like compound tubes, and which secrete cells which harden and fill up the lumen of the glands.

Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 420.

Crural ring, the upper opening of the crural canal, leading into the abdominal cavity. It is bounded in front by Poupert's ligament and the deep crural arch, behind by the pubes, internally by the deep crural arch, Gimbernat's ligament, and the conjoined tendon of the transversalis and internal oblique muscles, and externally by the femoral vein.—Crural septum, the layer of subperitoneal connective tissue which spans the crural ring in a normal state.—Crural sheath, the sheath which incloses the femoral vessels as they leave the abdomen. It is a continuation of the fascia lining the abdomen, and becomes closely adherent to the femoral vessels about an inch below the saphenous opening; but above it is larger, and contains some areolar tissue, and frequently a lymphatic gland.—Crural vein, the femoral vein. Deep crural arch, thickened band of fibers arching over the beginning of the crural sheath. It arises from the middle of Poupert's ligament, and is inserted into the iliopectineal

crus (krus), n.; pl. crura (krö'ra). [L., the leg.]

In anat. and zool.: (a) The lower leg; the part of the hind limb between the knee and the ankle; the second segment of the hind limb, corresponding to the forearm or antebrachium of the fore limb, represented by the length of the tibia or shinbone. (b) Some part likened to a leg, as one of a pair of supporting parts; a pillar; a peduncle.

Vacuole about in the centre of each crus, filled with moving granules.
H. C. Wood, Fresh-Water Alga, p. 107.

Crura cerebelli, the peduncles of the cerebellum.—Crura cerebelli ad superior, the superior pedun-cles of the cerebellum.—Crura cerebelli ad inferior, the inferior pedun-cles of the cerebellum.—Crura cerebelli ad posterior, the middle pedun-cles of the cerebellum.—Crura spinosa, the posterior pillars of the fornx.—Crura of the diaphragm, acetic opening.—Crus anterior median oblongatus, same as crus cerebri.—Crus cerebri, superior, one of the superior peduncles of the cerebellum.—Crus cerebri, the peduncle of the brain; the mass of white nervous tissue forming with its fellow the lower portion of the mesencephalon and in part of the thalamencephalon, and extending from the pons Varolii to the optic tract.—Crus cerebri ad medullam, the inferior peduncle of the cerebellum. See peduncle.—Crus cerebri anterior, the columnar form, or anterior pillar of the form.—Crus cerebri, the middle peduncle of the cerebellum; a mass of white nerve-tissue passing down on each side from the cerebellum to form the pons Varolii.—Crus cerebri, crus thalamencephali, what is improperly called, in human anatomy, the olfactory nerve or tract, being a contracted portion of the brain itself, between the mesencephalon and the rhinencephalon.—Crus penis, the posterior fourth of one of the corpora cavernosa, which, diverging from its fellow, is attached to the pubis and ischiol ramus.

crusade (krŭ-sād'), n. [Early mod. E. also crusado, croisade, croisado, earlier crusade, late ME. croisade, croisat (being variously accented to the ML., Sp., or F.); = F. croisade (after Pr.), OF. croisade (also in another form croiserois) = Pr. croisada, croisada = Sp. Pg. crusada = It. crociata, < ML. crociata, a crusade, lit. (sc. expeditio (n.)) an expedition of persons marked with or bearing the sign of the cross, prop. fem. pp. of cruciare, mark with the cross, < L. crus (crus-), cross: see cross, n. and v., and cruciate. The earlier ME. word for 'crusade' was crucifery: see crucifery.] 1. A military expedition under the banner of the cross; especially, one of the medieval expeditions undertaken by the Christians of Europe for the recovery of the Holy Land from the Mohammedans. The crusading spirit was aroused throughout Europe in 1095 by the preaching of the monk Peter the Hermit, who with Walter the Penniless set out in 1096 with an immense rabble, who were nearly all destroyed on the way. The first real crusade, under Godfrey of Bouillon, 1099-9, resulted in the capture of Jerusalem and the establishment of a Christian kingdom in the Holy Land; the second, 1147, preached by St. Bernard, was unsuccessful; the third, 1189-92, led by the prince Frederick Barbarossa of Germany, Richard the Lion-hearted of England, and Philip Augustus of France, failed to recover Jerusalem, which the Mussulmans had taken in 1187; the fourth, 1202-4, ended in the establishment of a Latin empire in Constantinople, under Count Baldwin of Flanders, one of its leaders, the fifth, 1228-9, under the emperor Frederick II, the sixth, 1244-50, under St. Louis (Louis IX. of France), and the seventh and last, 1270-71, also under St. Louis, were all unsuccessful. There were other expeditions called crusades, including one of boys, 1212, 'the children's crusade,' in which many thousands perished by shipwreck or were enslaved. The cost of the crusades and the loss of life in them were enormous, but they stimulated commerce and the interchange of ideas between the West and the East. The expeditions against the Albigenses under papal auspices, 1207-29, were also called crusades.

For the crusade preached through western Christendom, A. D. 1188, it was ordained that the English should wear a white cross; the French a red; the Flemish a green one. Quoted in Book of Church of our Fathers, III. 1. 446, note.

The Crusades, with all their drawbacks, were the trial feat of a new world, a reconstituted Christendom, striving after a better ideal than that of piracy and fraternal bloodshed. Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 222.

2. Any vigorous concerted action for the defense or advancement of an idea or a cause, or in opposition to a public evil: as, a temperance crusade; the crusade against slavery.

The unwearied, unostentatious, and inglorious crusade of England against slavery may probably be regarded as among the three or four perfectly virtuous acts recorded in the history of nations. Lecky, Europ. Moral., I. 161.

crusade (krŭ-sād'), v. t. pret. and pp. crusaded, ppr. crusading. [Crusade, n.] To engage in a crusade; support or oppose any cause with zeal.

Crusade against sinners. M. Green, The Grotto.

crusade (krŭ-sād'), n. Same as crusado.

crusader (krŭ-sā'dēr), n. [CL. equiv. crusator.] A person engaged in a crusade. The crusaders of the middle ages bore as a badge on the breast or the shoulder a representation of the cross, the assumption of which, called 'taking the cross,' constituted a binding engagement and released them from all other obligations.

If other pilgrims had their peculiar marks, so too had the crusader. For a token of that vow which he had plighted, he always wore a cross sewed to his dress, until he went to, and all the while he stayed in, the Holy Land. Book, Church of our Fathers, III. 1. 448.

With all their faults these nobles (of Cyprus) were bona fide Crusaders: men who, like the first champions, were ready to cast in their lot in a Promised Land, and not, like the later adventurers, anxious merely to get all they could out of it, to make their fortunes. Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 200.

crusading (krŭ-sā'ding), p. a. [Ppr. of crusade, n. v.] Of or pertaining to the crusades; engaged in or favoring a crusade or crusades.

In how many kingdoms of the world has the crusading sword of this misguided saint-errant spared neither age, or merit, or sex, or condition.

Stowe, Tristram Shandy, II. 17.

Some grey crusading knight.

As in the East, so in the West, the crusading spirit was kept alive and made aggressive by the monks and the knights. Smith, Cond. Mod. Hist., p. 264.

crusado (krŭ-sād'), n. [Also crusado; a var., after Sp. Pg. crusado (fem.), of crusade: see crusade, n.] 1. A crusade.

If you suppose it [the style of architecture] imported into this kingdom by those that returned from the crusades, we must of course set it down as an eastern invention. H. Swinburne, Travels through Spain, xlv.

2. A bull issued by the pope urging a crusade, promising immediate entrance into heaven to those who died in the service, and many indulgences to those who survived.

Pope Sixtus quintus for the setting forth of the forenamed expedition . . . published a Crusado, with most ample indulgences which were printed in great numbers. Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 104.

crusado, crusado (krŭ-sād'), n. [Also crusado = D. krusad (Kilian) = G. crusade, etc., < Sp. Pg. crusado, a coin, prop. pp. of crusar, mark with a cross, < crus, a cross: see cross, n. and v., and of crusade, cruciate.] A money and coin of Portugal. The old crusado, now a mere name, was 400 reis, or 48 United States cents. The new crusado is 480 reis, or 54 cents. The Portugese settlements of the east coast of Africa reckon with a crusado of only 17 cents. Also crusado.

I had rather have lost my purse Full of crusados Shak., Othello, III. 4.

I was called from dinner to see some thousands of my lord's crusados weighed, and we find that 8000 come to about 580 or 40 generally. Pepps, Diary, June 5, 1662.

The King's fifth of the mines yields annually thirteen millions of crusados or million dollars Jefferson, Correspondence, II. 110.

crus (krŭs), n. [Also written improp. cruse; < ME. cruse, cruse, cruse, a pot, < Icel. krís, a pot, tankard, = Sw. Dan. krús = D. kruse, OD. kruse, a cup, pot, crucible, = MHG. krise, G. kruse, an earthen mug. Perhaps ult. connected with cruc, q. v. Hence, ult., the dim. cruset and cruset.] An earthen pot or bottle; any small vessel for liquids.

18. Orynos, n. Same as oranos.

19. Oryocnite (krí-ok'ē-nīt), n. [< Gr. oryos, cold, frost, + kytos, dust, + nit.] The name given by Nordenfjöld to a gray powder noticed by him in various places in Greenland on the surface of the inland ice, at a great distance from earth or rock, and which he considered to be of cosmic (meteoric) origin. This view was based in part on the occurrence, in addition to magnetite, of fine particles of metallic iron in the powder. The theory of the cosmic origin of oryocnite does not appear as yet to have been generally admitted.

20. Oryogen (krí'ō-jen), n. [< Gr. oryos, cold, frost, + gēn, producing; see gen.] That which produces cold; a freezing-mixture; an appliance or contrivance for reducing temperature below 0° C. F. G. G. G.

21. Oryolite, kryolite (krí'ō-līt), n. [< Gr. oryos, cold, frost, + litos, stone.] A fluoride of sodium and calcium found in Greenland, where it forms an extensive bed. It occurs in granitic masses, also in distinct crystals, and has a glassy vitreous luster, and a pale grayish-white, snow-white, or yellowish-brown color. It is important as a source of the alkali element, and is also used for making soda and some kinds of glass. Cryolite has also been discovered in Alaska in the Oral mountains, and in small quantities in Colorado.—Cryolite glass, or hot-cast porcelain, a semi-transparent or milky-white glass, made of silica and cryolite with oxide of zinc, melted together. Also called solite glass and fusible porcelain.

22. Oryphorus (krí-ō'f-rus), n. [NL., < Gr. oryos, cold, frost, + phoros, bearing, < pherein = to bear.] An instrument for showing the fall of temperature in water by evaporation. One form consists of two glass globes united by a tube. Water is poured into one globe and boiled to expel the air, and while boiling the apparatus is hermetically sealed. When cool, the pressure of the included vapor is reduced to that due to the temperature of the surrounding atmosphere. The empty globe is then surrounded by a freezing mixture, the vapor is condensed, and rapid evaporation takes place from the other globe, which is soon frozen by the lowering of its temperature.

23. Oryphylite (krí-ō-fīl'īt), n. [< Gr. oryos, cold, frost, + phyllos, leaf, + itēs.] A kind of mica occurring in the granite of Cape Ann, Massachusetts.

24. Oryphirina (krí-sī-rī-nā), n. [NL., orig. Cryptirina (Vieillot, 1816), also, and more correctly, Cryptirina (on another model, Cryptirina), < Gr. krýptēs, hide (κρύψω, a hiding), + rys, rys, nose.] A genus of tree-crows, of the subfamily Callaeonina, having as its type C. varians, the terms or so-called variable crow of Java. The genus is extended by some authors to include the Callaeonina at large, or birds of the genera Tennurus, Dendrocincla, and Vagabunda.

25. Orypsis (krí'psis), n. [Also kryptesis, < Gr. krýpsis, concealment, < krýptēs, conceal: see crypt.] Concealment. See extract.

The Tübingen divines advocated the kryptes or concealment, that is, the secret use of all divine attributes.

Schaf.

26. Orypsorchid, crypsorchis (krí-sōr'kīd, -kīs), n. [< Gr. krýptēs (future krýpsēs), hide, + orchis, testicle.] Same as cryptorchis.

27. Crypt (krípt), n. [Dan. krypte = F. crypte = Fr. cropt (also crota) = Sp. cripta = Pg. cripta = It. cripta, < L. cripta, < Gr. krýptēs or krýptē, a vault, crypt, fem. of krýptos, hidden, secret, verbal adj. of krýptēs, hide, keep secret, akin to kalýptēs, cover, hide. See crode, crowd, and groat, groth, ult. doublets of crypt.] 1. A hidden or secret recess; a subterranean cell or cave, especially one constructed or used for the interment of bodies, as in the catacombs.

What had been a wondrous and intimate experience of the soul, a flash into the very crypt and basis of man's nature from the fire of trial, had become ritual and tradition.

Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 237.

2. A part of an ecclesiastical building, as a cathedral, church, etc., below the chief floor,

Crypt—Cathedral of Bourges, France

They are biennial fishes with an eel-like aspect, a long dorsal fin sustained by stout spines only, no ventrals, and an oblong subcylindrical head. Two species inhabit the northwestern Atlantic, and have been called cryptacanthodes, and one inhabits the Alaskan seas. Also Cryptacanthodes.

8. Crypta, n. Plural of cryptus. cryptal (krí'p'tal), a. [< crypt + -al.] In anat. and physiol., pertaining to or derived from a crypt. See crypt, 3.

The use of the cryptal or follicular secretion is to keep the parts on which it is poured supple and moist, and to preserve them from the action of irritating bodies with which they have to come in contact.

Dunham.

9. Crypted (krí'p'ted), a. [< crypt + -ed.] In arch., vaulted. [Rare.]

A crypted hall and stair lead to the chapter-house.

A. J. C. Hare, Rumba, iii.

10. Cryptic (krí'p'tik), a. and n. [< LL. crypticus, < Gr. krýptikos, hidden, < krýptos, hidden: see crypt.] 1. a. Hidden; secret; occult.

This cryptic and involved method of his providence have I ever admired.

Br. T. Brown, Ralgio Medici, i. 17.

The subject is the receiver of Godhead, and as every comparison must feel his being enhanced by that cryptic might.

Emerson, Experience.

2. Cryptic syllogism, a syllogism not in regular form, the premises being transposed, or one of them omitted, or both omitted, and only the middle term indicated. The following is an example of the last kind. "The existence of God is proved that true greatness is not confined to the male sex."

3. II. n. The art of recording any discourse so that the meaning is concealed from ordinary readers.

There be also other diversities of Methods, vulgar and received, as that of Resolution or Analysis, of Constitution or Synthesis, of Concealment or Cryptic, etc., which I do allow well of.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning (Original English ed.),

[Works, III. 407.]

4. Cryptical (krí'p'tī-kal), a. Same as cryptic. Cryptically (krí'p'tī-kal-ī), adv. Secretly; in an occult manner.

We take the word acid in a familiar sense, without cryptically distinguishing it from those saps that are akin to it.

Boyle.

5. Crypticus (krí'p'tī-kus), n. [NL., < LL. crypticus, covered, concealed: see crypto.] In soöl.: (a) A genus of atachelate heteromorphous beetles, of the family Tenebrionidae. C. quisquilius, a European species, is an example. Latroille, 1817. (b) A genus of birds, of the family Momotidae, or sawbills. Swinson, 1837.

6. Crypto-, etc., cryptio-, < Gr. krýptos, hidden, secret: see crypt.] An element in words of Greek origin, meaning 'hidden, concealed, not evident or obvious.' See calypso.

7. Cryptobranch (krí'p'tō-brang'), a. and n. 1. a. Same as cryptobranchiate.

2. n. An animal with covered or concealed gills, as a crustacean, mollusk, or reptile.

8. Cryptobranchiate (krí'p'tō-brang'ki-ā'tā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of cryptobranchiatus, having concealed gills: see cryptobranchiate.] A group of animals having concealed gills. Specifically—(a) A division of crustaceans, including the decapods. (b) A division of gastropods (the typical Dorididae) having the branchia combined in a single retractile crown. (c) A suborder of gastropods, containing most of the class contrasted with Pulmonobranchiata and Nudibranchiata. J. B. Gray, 1831. (d) The pteropods considered as a suborder of diocious gastropods. Dunham, 1830. (e) A division of urodele amphibians. Also Cryptobranchiata in all senses.

Cryptocarpace (krip-tō-kār-pēs), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + καρπός, fruit.] One of two prime divisions of aculeata, made by Eschscholtz in 1829, containing those with inward or concealed genitalia. They are more fully called Diocophora cryptocarpace, as distinguished from Diocophora phanerocarpace, and correspond to the modern group Hydromedusa, though the character implied in the name does not always exist. Apodes is a synonym.

cryptocarpic (krip-tō-kār-pik), a. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + καρπός, fruit.] Pertaining to or effected by means of cryptocarps or cystocarps.

cryptocarpous (krip-tō-kār-pus), a. [As Cryptocarpace + -ous.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Cryptocarpace; not phanerocarpaceous.

Cryptoccephalus (krip-tō-sef'al'-i-dēs), n. pl. [NL., < Cryptoccephalus + -idae.] A family of phytophagous tetramerous beetles, typified by the genus Cryptoccephalus. It is related to the Chrysomelidae, in which it is sometimes merged.

cryptoccephalous (krip-tō-sef'-a-lus), a. [As Cryptoccephalus + -ous.] Having the head concealed.

Cryptoccephalus (krip-tō-sef'-a-lus), n. [NL., < Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + κεφαλή, head.] 1. A genus of beetles, referred to the family Chrysomelidae, or made the type of a family Cryptoccephalidae. C. sericus is a small beetle, about a quarter of an inch long, of a brilliant golden-green color, abundant in Great Britain. C. lineola is a glossy black species, with red elytra bordered with black. 2. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + κεφαλή, head.] A monster whose head is excessively small and does not appear externally. Dunghoon.

Cryptocserata (krip-tō-ser'-a-tā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + κέρως, pl. κέρωτα, horn.] A division of heteropterous hemipterous insects, including the aquatic families Notonectidae, Nepidae, and Galgulidae: opposed to Gymnocserata. Also called Hydrocorrea.

cryptocerous (krip-tō-ser'-us), a. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + κέρως, horn, + -ous.] Having concealed antennae; specifically, of or pertaining to the Cryptocserata.

Cryptochirus (krip-tō-kī'-rus), n. [NL., < Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + χέρως, the hand.] A genus of brachyurous decapod crustaceans, of the series Oxyopodoidea. The species live on corals, and are provided with a kind of pouch for the eggs and young.

Cryptochirus prefers to make his home in the more solid corals, where the young, settling down in the centre of a young polyp, kills it, while the surrounding polyps continuing to grow soon build a tubular dwelling for the crab. Stand. Nat. Hist., II. 64.

Cryptochiton (krip-tōk'-iton), n. [NL. (J. E. Gray, 1847), < Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + χiton, chiton.] A genus of polyplacophorous mollusks, or chitons. C. stellatus is an example.

crypto-Christian (krip-tō-kris'-i-an), n. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, secret, + Christian.] One who is secretly a Christian.

Those Jews became Christians in apostolic times who were already what may be called crypto-Christians. J. H. Newman, Gram. of Assent, p. 468.

Cryptocochlides (krip-tō-kōk'-li-dēs), n. pl. [NL. (Latreille, 1826), < Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + κοχλῆς, shell.] A section of peccinibranchiata gastropods, proposed for the genus Sigarus.

cryptocrystalline (krip-tō-kris'-tā-lin), a. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, secret, + crystalline.] Indistinctly or imperfectly crystalline: used of a mineral whose structure is so fine that its crystalline character is not apparent to the eye, or of which is semi-amorphous; also of a rock, or of its base, in which no definite character is discernible in the constituent particles, even with the microscope. See microcrystalline.

crypto-deist (krip-tō-dē-ist), n. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + deist.] One who is secretly a deist.

He [Thomas Paine] was already a crypto-deist. N. O. Oakenham, Short Studies, p. 244.

Cryptodibranchia (krip-tō-di-brang'-ki-ā), n. pl. [NL. (De Blainville, 1814), < Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + NL. Dibranchia.] An order of cephaloporous mollusks containing all the cephalopoda: later called Cryptodibranchiata, and limited in range.

Cryptodibranchiata (krip-tō-di-brang'-ki-ā-tā), n. pl. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + NL. Dibranchiata, q. v.] In De Blainville's system of classification (1824), an order of cephalopoda, containing the dibranchiata forms: same as Acetabulifera and Dibranchiata.

cryptodibranchiate (krip-tō-di-brang'-ki-āt), a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Cryptodibranchiata; dibranchiate or acetabuliferous, as a cephalopod.

cryptodidymus (krip-tō-did'-i-mus), n. [NL., < Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + δίδυμος, a twin.] In teratol., a monstrosity in which one fetus is found contained in another. Dunghoon.

cryptodirus (krip-tō-dī-rus), a. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + δέρω, the neck, throat, + -ous.] Having a concealed or concealable neck, as a tortoise in which the neck is so completely retractile that the head can be directly withdrawn into the shell: opposed to pleurodirus.

Cryptodon (krip-tō-don), n. [NL., < Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + δόντις, Ionic δόν (δόντις) = E. tooth.] A genus of siphonate bivalve mollusks, of the family Lucinidae, having no hinge-teeth, whence the name.

cryptodont (krip-tō-dont), a. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + δόντις (δόντις) = E. tooth.] Having concealed teeth, or not known to have teeth; specifically, pertaining to the Cryptodonta or Cryptodontia.

Cryptodontia (krip-tō-don'tā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. (as Gr.) of cryptodont (t): see cryptodont.] In conch., a section or order of paleozoic bivalve mollusks, having the thin shell cryptodont, two ciboria, and entire pallial line.

Cryptodontia (krip-tō-don'tā-shi-ā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. (as L.) of cryptodont (t): see cryptodont.] In Owen's system of classification, a family of extinct reptiles, of the order Anomodontia, having both jaws toothless. It contains the genera Rhynchonotus and Oudenodon, thus distinguished from Dioynodon.

cryptogam (krip-tō-gam), n. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + γάμος, marriage.] A cryptogamous plant; a plant of the class Cryptogamia.

Cryptogamia (krip-tō-gā-mī-ā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of **cryptogamus*, equiv. to cryptogamus, having an obscure mode of fertilization: see cryptogamous and cryptogamy.] In bot., in the Linnæan system of classification, the second great series and final class, which included all plants in which there were no stamens and pistils, and therefore no proper flowers: thus distinguished from the first series, Phanogamia. The name remains in general use, and the group is further characterized by the absence of a seed containing an embryo. The organs and methods of reproduction vary greatly, in some cases being closely analogous to those of phanogamous plants, while in the lowest no sexual character whatever is distinguishable. As improvements in the microscope have made possible a more thorough study of the Cryptogamia, their classification has been gradually modified and perfected, but it still remains to some extent unsettled, especially in regard to the lower groups. A division into higher and lower cryptogams is often made, corresponding to the Microgamia and Amphigamia classes of De Candoille's arrangement, otherwise known as acrogens and thallogams. The first group are either vascular (including the Filices, Aspidioceae, and their allies, also called Phryophytes) or cellular (including the Hepaticae and Musci, unitedly called Bryophytes). The lower cryptogams are wholly cellular, and are variously subdivided, the usual division being into algae, Lichenes, and Fungi. (On various authorities, the Fungi are supposed to be included in the Phyces. The number of known species is very large. In Phyces, within the Fungi, alone are nearly twice as numerous as in the Phanogamia. It is probable that in less explored regions many species are yet undiscovered.)

cryptogamian (krip-tō-gā-mī-an), a. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + γάμος, marriage.] Same as cryptogamous.

cryptogamic (krip-tō-gā-mī-ik), a. [As cryptogam + -ic.] Pertaining or relating to the Cryptogamia; cryptogamous: as, cryptogamic botany.

There is good reason to believe that the first plants which appeared on this earth were cryptogamic. Derwin, Cross and Self Fertilization, p. 402.

cryptogamist (krip-tō-gā-mīst), n. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + γάμος, marriage.] One who is skilled in cryptogamic botany.

cryptogamous (krip-tō-gā-mus), a. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + γάμος, marriage.] Having an obscure mode of fertilization, < Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, obscure, + γάμος, marriage.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Cryptogamia. Also cryptogamic. cryptogamy (krip-tō-gā-mī), n. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + γάμος, marriage.] Obscure fructification, as in plants of the class Cryptogamia. See Cryptogamia.

cryptogram (krip-tō-gam), n. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + γράμμα, a writing, < γράφω, write.] A message or writing in secret characters or otherwise occult; a cryptograph.

cryptograph (krip-tō-grāf), n. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, secret, + γράφω, write.] 1. Something written in secret characters or cipher.—2. A system of secret writing; a cipher.

cryptographic (krip-tō-grāf-ik), a. [As cryptograph + -al.] Cryptographic. Boyle. cryptographer (krip-tō-grāf-ēr), n. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + γράφω, write.] One who writes in secret characters.

cryptographic, cryptographical (krip-tō-grāf-ik, -i-kal), a. [As cryptograph + -ic, -ical.] 1. Written in secret characters or in cipher: as, a cryptographic despatch.—2. Designed or contrived for writing in secret characters: as, a cryptographic machine.

cryptography (krip-tō-grāf-ē), n. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, secret, + γραφία, < γράφω, write.] 1. The act or art of writing in secret characters.—2. A system of secret or occult characters; that which is written in cipher.

The strange cryptography of Gaffarel in his Starry Book of Heaven. Sir T. Browne, Garden of Cyrus, III.

All which relates to the spirits, their names, speeches, shows, noises, clothing, actions, &c., were all cryptography: feigned relations, concealing true ones of a very different nature.

Hooker, in I. D'Israeli's Amen. of Lit., II. 811.

Cryptohypnus (krip-tō-hīp'-nus), n. [NL. (Eschscholtz, 1826), irreg. < Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + υπνός = L. somnus, sleep.] A genus of click-beetles, of the family Elateridae, distinguished principally by the distinctly securiform terminal joint of the palpi, and the very short and oval, almost round, scutellum. It is a very large and wide-spread genus, comprising upward of 100 species, of which 34 are from North America. The smallest species of the family are found in this genus. C. minutissimus measuring less than one millimeter in length. The color is usually uniform black or yellowish-brown.

cryptolite (krip-tō-līt), n. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + λίθος, stone.] A phosphate of cerium, occurring in minute crystals or grains embedded in the apatite of Arendal, Norway.

cryptology (krip-tō-lō-jī), n. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, secret, + λογία, < λέγω, speak.] Secret or occult language; cryptography.

Cryptomonadina (krip-tō-mon-ā-dī-nā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + μονάδα (μονάδα) = unit, + -ina.] 1. In Ehrenberg's system of classification (1836), a family of loricate infusorians of persistent form, undergoing complete fission and lacking an intestine and appendages.—2. In Stein's system (1878), a family of flagellate infusorians, represented by the genera Cryptomonas, Chilomonas, and Nephroselmis.

cryptomonadine (krip-tō-mon-ā-dī-n), a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Cryptomonadina.

cryptomorphite (krip-tō-mōr'-fīt), n. [Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + μορφή, form, + -itis.] A hydrous borate of calcium and sodium, occurring in white kernels with microcrystalline texture. Crypton, n. See krypton.

Cryptonemum (krip-tō-nēm'-mī-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κρυπτός, hidden, + νήμα, thread.] A sub-order of the Floridæ among Algae, including about 150 species, mostly inhabiting warm seas. They are of purplish or rose-red color, with generally a Planted Tinamon (Crypturus alaudinus).

The name is retained as the designation of one of the several genera into which the family Pyraustidae is now divided, containing such species as C. cinereus, C. pilosus, C. taenipennis, etc. See Pyraustidae.

cryptus (krip'tus), n. [NL., < Gr. κρυπτός, hidden: see crypt.] A genus of Ichneumonidae,

a, female of C. extrematus (line shows natural size); b, enlarged abdomen of C. cinereus, female; c, enlarged abdomen of C. extrematus, male; d, enlarged portion of wing of same.

of the family Ichneumonidae, typical of the subfamily Cryptinae. C. extrematus is a species which infests the American silkworm.

crystal (kris'tal), n. and a. [Formerly crystal, also often erroneously chrysalis, chrysalis, etc., now acc. to L. spelling; < ME. crystal, crystal, < OF. crystal, F. crystal = Pr. Sp. crystal = Pg. crystal = It. cristallo = AS. crystal = D. kristal = OHG. christalla, MHG. kristalle, fem., kristall, masc., G. krySTALL, kristall, masc., = Dan. kryстал = Sw. kristall, < L. crystallum, ice, crystal, < Gr. κρυσταλλος, clear ice, ice, also rock-crystal (so called from its resemblance to ice, of which it was supposed to be a modified and permanent form), < κρυσταλλινός, freeze, < κρύος, cold, frost.] L. n. 1. In chem. and mineral, a body which, by the operation of molecular attraction, has assumed a definite internal structure with the form of a regular solid inclosed by a certain number of plane surfaces arranged according to the laws of symmetry. The internal structure is exhibited in the cleavage, in the behavior of sections in polarized light, etc. The external form is discussed under crystallography (which see). Crystals are obtained in the laboratory either by fusing substances by heat and allowing them gradually to cool, or by dissolving them in a fluid and then abstracting the latter by slow evaporation; also by the direct condensation of a vapor produced by sublimation, as in the case of arsenious acid, in the same way that snow-crystals are formed directly from water-vapor in the upper atmosphere. The name was first applied to the transparent varieties of quartz, specifically called rock-crystal.

There was a sea of glass like unto crystal. Rev. iv. 6. The term crystal is now applied to all symmetrical solid shapes assumed spontaneously by lifeless matter.

Huxley, Physiography, p. 59. 2. Glass. (a) Glass of a high degree of transparency and freedom from color. It is heavier than ordinary glass, because containing much oxide of lead. (b) Fine glass used for table-vessels or other table-service, or for ornamental pieces. The term is sometimes used as synonymous with cut glass. (c) The glass cover of a watch-case.

3. A substance resembling rock-crystal or glass in its properties, especially in transparency and clearness.

Every man in this age has not a soul of crystal, for all men to read their actions through.

Bacon, and Fl., Philaster, l. 1.

4. In her., the color white: said of that color when described in blazoning a nobleman's escutcheon, according to the system of blazoning by precious stones; pearl, however, is more commonly used.—5. A very fine wide white durant, once used for making nuns' veils.—Axis of a crystal. See axial and crystallography.—Charoite's crystals, in pathol., colorless octahedral or rhomboidal crystals found in the sputum of asthmatic and bronchitic patients.—Crystals of Venus, crystallized neutral acetate of copper. [Venus is here used as a symbol of copper (with allusion to Cyprus).] Distorted crystal, a crystal whose form varies more or less from the ideal geometrical solid which its symmetry requires. This is due to the extension of certain faces at the expense of others during the growth of the crystal, but in general without altering the interfacial angles. In fact, all crystals are more or less distorted.—Embedded crystals, crystals enveloped within the mass of a rock or other mineral.—Geniculated crystal, a twin or compound crystal, consisting of two or more parts bent at an angle to one another, as is common with the mineral rutile.—Iceland crystal, a variety of calcite or crystallized calcium carbonate brought from Iceland, remarkable for its transparency.—Implanted crystals, crystals which project from the free surface of a rock upon which they have been formed.—Negative crystal. (a) A cavity in a mineral mass having the form of a crystal, commonly that peculiar to the mineral itself. (b) In optics. See refraction.—Pink crystals. Name as pink salt. See salt.—Plastic crystal, a trade-name for a kind of Portland cement composed of silica and alumina and traces of oxide of iron, lime, magnesia, and some alkali.—Positive crystal, in optics. See refraction.—Pseudomorphous crystal. See pseudomorph.—Replaced crystal, a crystal having one plane or more in the place of each of its edges or angles.—Rock-crystal, or mountain crystal, a general name for all the transparent crystals of quartz, particularly of limpid or colorless quartz. From their brilliancy such crystals are often popularly called diamonds, as Lake George diamonds, Hristol diamonds, etc.—Twin crystal. See twin.

II. a. Consisting of crystal, or like crystal; clear; transparent; pellucid.

His mistress
Did hold his eyes lock'd in her crystal looks.
Shak., T. G. of V., II. 4.

By crystal streams that murmur through the meads.
Dryden.

In crystal currents of clear morning seas.
Tennyson, Princess, II.

Crystal Palace, the large building, composed chiefly of glass and iron, erected in Hyde Park, London, for the universal exhibition of 1851, and subsequently re-erected at Sydenham, near London, as a permanent institution for public instruction and entertainment. The name has since been applied to other structures of like character.—Crystal violet, a coal-tar color used in dyeing, resembling ordinary methyl violet in its application.

crystalline (kris-tal'ik), a. [< crystal + -ic.] Pertaining to crystals or crystallization: as, crystalline force. Ashburner.

crystalliferous (kris-tal'if'g-rus), a. [< L. crystallum, crystal, + ferre, = E. bear<sup>1</sup>, + -ous.] Bearing or containing crystals.

crystalligerous (kris-tal'ij'g-rus), a. [< L. crystallum, crystal, + gerere, bear, + -ous.] Bearing crystals: specifically applied to those spores of radiolarians which contain crystals.

In those individuals which produce crystalligerous swarm-spores, each spore encloses a small crystal.
E. R. Lankester, Encyc. Brit., XIX. 862.

crystallin (kris'tal-in), n. [< crystal + -in.] 1. An albuminoid substance contained in the crystalline lens of the eye: same as globulin.—2. In chem., an old name for aniline.

crystalline (kris'tal-in or -lin), a. and n. [= F. crystalin = Pr. crystalin = Sp. crystalino = Pg. crystalino = It. cristallino = D. kristallijn = MHG. kristallin, G. krySTALLIN (cf. Dan. krySTALLIN, G. krySTALLIN; Sw. krySTALLIN), < L. crystallinus, < Gr. κρυστάλλινος, < κρυσταλλος, clear ice, crystal: see crystal.] L. a. 1. Consisting of crystal.

Mount, eagle, to my palace crystalline.
Shak., Cymbeline, v. 4.

2. Relating or pertaining to crystals or crystallization.

Snow being apparently frozen cloud or vapour, aggregated by a confused action of crystalline laws. Whewell.

3. Formed by crystallization; of the nature of a crystal, especially as regards its internal structure, cleavage, etc.: opposed to amorphous.

The most definite of the properties of perfect chemical compounds is their crystalline structure.
Whewell, Hist. Scientific Ideas, II. 28.

It [ice] is composed of crystalline particles, which, though in contact with one another, are, however, not packed together so as to occupy the least possible space.
J. Croli, (Climate and Cosmology, p. 262.

4. Resembling crystal; pure; clear; transparent; pellucid: specifically applied in anatomy to several structures, as the crystalline humor, cones, etc. See below.

He on the wings of cherub rode sublime,
On the crystalline sky. Milton, P. L., vi. 772.

5. In entom., reflecting light like glass: specifically applied to the ocelli or simple eyes when they are apparently colorless, resembling glass.—Crystalline cones. See crystalline rods.—Crystalline heavens, in the Ptolemaic system of astronomy, two spheres imagined between the primum mobile, or outer circle of the heavens, which by its motion was supposed to carry around all within it, and the firmament.—Crystalline humor or lens, a lentiform pellucid body, composed of a transparent firm substance inclosed in a membranous capsule, and situated in front of the vitreous body and behind the iris of the eye. It is doubly convex, but the posterior surface is more convex than the anterior. The central part is more dense and firm than the exterior parts, and is made up of concentric lamellae. It is of high refracting power, and serves to produce that refraction of the rays of light which is necessary to cause them to meet in the retina and form a perfect image there. See cut under eye.—Crystalline rods, crystalline cones, cells specially modified as refractive bodies, forming the end-organs of the nervous apparatus of vision of the Arthropoda.

Each group separates off a transparent highly refractive substance, which forms the so-called crystalline cone.
Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 264.

Crystalline style, a flexible, transparent body of gritty appearance and unknown function, contained in the pharyngeal oesum of bivalve mollusks, as species of Macoma.—Crystalline ware, a name given by Josiah Wedgwood to fine pottery of his manufacture veined in imitation of natural semi-precious stones, the veining generally going through the paste. Compare granite-ware, agate-ware.

II. n. A crystallized rock, or one only partially crystallized, as granite.

crystallinity (kris-tal-in'i-ti), n. [< crystalline + -ity.] The character or state of being crystalline; crystalline structure.

The tendency to crystallinity observable in large masses of cast metal.
Boya, Brit., XIII. 265.

crystallisability, crystallisable, etc. See crystallisability, etc.

crystallite (kris'tal-it), n. [< Gr. κρυσταλλος, crystal, + -itis.] 1. Whinstone cooled slowly after fusion.—2. The term suggested by Vogel-sang as a general name for aggregations of globulites in various forms. See omulite, margarite, and longulite. These terms are used exclusively in describing various groupings of minute drop-like bodies (globulites), seen under the microscope in thin sections of rocks. See globulite.

crystallitis (kris-tal-it'is), n. [NL., < Gr. κρυσταλλος, crystal (crystalline lens), + -itis.] In pathol., phacitis. Dunglison.

crystallisability (kris'tal-it-sa-bil'i-ti), n. The quality of being crystallizable; capability of being crystallized. Also spelled crystallisability.

The ready crystallisability of alum. Ure, Dict., I. 125.

crystallisable (kris'tal-it-sa-bl), a. [= F. crystallisable = Sp. crystallizable; as crystallise + -able.] Capable of being crystallized or of assuming a crystalline structure. Also spelled crystallizable.

crystallisation (kris'tal-it-sā'shon), n. [= F. crystallisation = Sp. crystalización = Pg. crystalización = It. crystalizzazione = D. kristallisatie; as crystallize + -ation.] 1. The process by which the molecules of a substance which is in the state of a liquid (or vapor) unite in regular (crystalline) form when it solidifies by cooling or evaporation. If the process is slow and undisturbed, the molecules assume a regular arrangement, each substance taking a determinate form according to its natural laws, but if the process is rapid or disturbed, the external form may be more or less irregular. An amorphous solid body may also undergo partial crystallization by a molecular rearrangement, giving it a more or less complete crystalline structure, as, for instance, in the iron of a railroad-bridge after long use. See crystallography. 2. The mass or body formed by the process of crystallization.

Also spelled crystallization. Alternate crystallization, a species of crystallization which takes place when several crystallizable substances having little affinity for one another are present in the same solution. The substance which is largest in quantity and least soluble crystallizes first, in part; the least soluble substance next in quantity then begins to crystallize; and thus different substances, as salts, are often deposited in successive layers from the same solution.—Water of crystallization, water which is held by certain salts as a part of their crystalline structure, but is not inherent in the molecule. Thus, common sodium carbonate, when it crystallizes from a solution, contains for each molecule of sodium carbonate ten molecules of water. This is so weakly held that it escapes as vapor in dry air at ordinary temperatures. The crystalline form of the salt often depends on the number of molecules of water which the crystals contain. Water of crystallization differs from combined water in that it does not belong to the molecular structure, but only to the crystalline structure, of the substance.

crystallize (kris'tal-iz), v.; pret. and pp. crystallized, ppr. crystallizing. [= F. crystalliser = Sp. crystalizar = Pg. crystallizar = It. cristallizzare = D. kristalliseren = G. kristallisieren = Dan. krySTALLISERE = Sw. kristallisera; as crystal + -ize. Cf. Gr. κρυστάλλιζω, be clear as crystal.] I. trans. 1. To cause to assume a crystalline structure or shape; form into crystals: often used figuratively.

Bodies which are perfectly crystallized exhibit the most complete regularity and symmetry of form.
Whewell, Hist. Scientific Ideas, I. 265.

Around the Academy are crystallized several literary enterprises, the fame of which is reflected upon it.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XXII. 28.

2. To change to the state of crystal. [Rare.]

When the Winters keener breath began To crystallize the Baltic Ocean,
To glaze the Lakes.

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, II, The Handy-Crafts

II. intrans. 1. To be converted into a crystal; unite, as the separate particles of a substance, and form a regular solid.—2. Figuratively—(a) To assume a definite form and fixity, as an opinion, view, or idea, at first indeterminate or vague; take substantial and definite shape: as, public opinion on this subject is beginning to crystallize.

There is ever a tendency of the most hurtful kind to allow opinions to crystallize into creeds.
Jevons, Pol. Econ., p. 206.

(b) To assume (as a number of opinions, views, or ideas, at first unsettled or diverse) a definite form, and become concentrated upon or collected round a given subject.

Also spelled crystalline.

crystalliser (kris'ta-lī-sēr), n. That which causes or assists in crystallization; something employed in a process of crystallization. Also spelled crystallizer.

They (boilers) may be emptied at pleasure into lower receivers, called crystallizers, by means of leaden syphons and long-necked funnels. Ure, Dict., i. 150.

crystallod (kris'ta-lod), n. [< crystal(l) + od.] The od of crystals, or a supposed odic force derived from crystallization. See od.

Instead of saying the "od derived from crystallization," we may name this product crystallod.

Reichenbach, Dynamion (trans. 1851), p. 294.

crystallo-engraving (kris'ta-lō-en-grā'ving), n. A method of ornamenting glass by means of casts of a design which are placed on the inner surface of the metal mold in which the glass vessel is formed, become embedded in the surface of the glass, and are removed with it. When the material forming the cast is separated from the glass vessel, the design is left in intaglio.

crystallogenesis (kris'ta-lō-jen'īk, -īkal), n. [< crystallogeny + -sis.] Relating to crystallogeny; crystal-producing; as, crystallogenic attraction.

crystallogeny (kris'ta-lōj'e-nī), n. [= F. cristallogénie, < Gr. κρυσταλλος, crystal, + -γενία, < -γενε, producing.] In crystal, that department of science which treats of the production of crystals.

crystallographer (kris'ta-lōg'rā-fēr), n. [As crystallography + -er.] One who describes crystals or the manner of their formation.

In the present condition of science, minerals, considered as such, and not as geological materials, fall rather within the province of the chemist and crystallographer. H. Forbes, Literary Papers, p. 165.

crystallographic, crystallographical (kris'ta-lō-grāf'ik, -īkal), a. [= F. cristallographique; as crystallography + -ic, -ical.] Of or pertaining to crystallography.

When a beam of light passes . . . through Iceland spar parallel to the crystallographic axis, there is no double refraction. Tyndall, Light and Elect., p. 103.

crystallographically (kris'ta-lō-grāf'īkal-ī), adv. With regard to crystallography or its principles; as in crystallography. Whewell.

crystallography (kris'ta-lōg'rā-fī), n. [= F. cristallographie = Sp. cristalografía = Pg. cristalografia = It. cristalografia = D. kristallografie = Dan. kristallografi, < Gr. κρυσταλλος, crystal, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write.] 1. The science of the process of crystallization, and of the forms and structure of crystals. The following are the generally adopted systems of crystallization, based upon the degree of symmetry which characterizes the different forms, but defined according to the length and inclination of the assumed axes: (a) the isometric, characterized by three rectangular axes, all of equal length; (b) the tetragonal, by three rectangular axes, two of which are of equal length; (c) the hexagonal (and rhombic), by four axes, three of equal length, in the same plane, and inclined to one another at an angle of 60°, the fourth of different length, and at right angles to the plane of the other three; (d) the orthorhombic, by three rectangular axes of unequal length; (e) the monoclinic, by three axes, two at right angles to each other, and the third perpendicular to one and oblique to the other; and (f) the triclinic, by three axes, all oblique to one another. (See these names.) Instead of isometric, the terms monometric, cubic, and regular are sometimes used; instead of tetragonal, dimetric; instead of orthorhombic, trimetric or rhombic; instead of monoclinic, monosymmetric or oblique; and instead of triclinic, asymmetric or anorthic. The isometric, tetragonal, and orthorhombic systems are sometimes spoken of collectively as orthometric, and the monoclinic and triclinic as clinometric; similarly the tetragonal and hexagonal systems have been called isodimetric. The study of crystallography is of great importance to the chemist and mineralogist, as the nature of many substances may be ascertained from an inspection of the forms of their crystals.

2. A discourse or treatise on crystals and crystallization.

crystalloid (kris'ta-lōid), a. and n. [= F. cristalloïde = It. cristalloide, < Gr. κρυσταλλοειδής, < κρυσταλλος, crystal, + -ειδής, shape.] 1. a. Resembling a crystal.

The grouping . . . of a number of smaller crystalloid molecules. H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 6.

II. n. 1. The name given by Professor Graham to a class of bodies which have the power, when in solution, of passing easily through membranes, as parchment-paper, and which he found to be of a crystalline character. Metallic salts and organic bodies, as sugar, morphine, and oxalic acid, are crystalloids. They are the opposite of colloids, which have not this permeating power. See colloid.

The relatively small-atomed crystalloids have immensely greater diffusive power than the relatively large-atomed colloids. H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 7.

2. A protein crystal—that is, a granule of protein in the form of a crystal, differing from an organic crystal in the inconstancy of its angles and in its property of swelling when immersed in water. Such crystalloids are of various forms and usually colorless.

crystalloidal (kris'ta-lōid'al), a. [< crystalloid + -al.] Of or pertaining to or of the nature of a crystalloid.

The same condition could be produced by nearly all crystalloidal substances. E. W. Richardson, Prevent. Med., p. 90.

crystallogogy (kris'ta-lōj'ō-jī), n. [= F. cristallologie = Pg. cristalogogia, < Gr. κρυσταλλος, crystal, + -λογία, < λῡειν, speak: see -ology.] The science which considers the structure of bodies in inorganic nature so far as it is the result of cohesive attraction. It embraces crystallography, which treats of the geometrical form of crystals, and crystallogeny, which discusses their origin and method of formation.

crystallogomagnetic (kris'ta-lō-mag-net'ik), a. [< Gr. κρυσταλλος, crystal, + μαγνης (μαγνη-), magnet, + -ic.] Pertaining to the magnetic properties of crystallized bodies, especially the behavior of a crystal in a magnetic field; as, "crystallogomagnetic action," Encyc. Brit., XVI. 377.

crystallogomancy (kris'ta-lō-man-sī), n. [= F. cristallomanie, < Gr. κρυσταλλος, crystal, + μανία, divination.] A mode of divining by means of a transparent body, as a precious stone, crystal globe, etc., formerly in high esteem. The operator first muttered over the crystal (a horyl was preferred) certain formulas of prayer, and then gave it into the hands of a young man or a virgin, who, thereupon, by oral communication from spirits in the crystal, or by written characters as in it, was supposed to receive the information desired.

crystallogometry (kris'ta-lōm'e-trī), n. [= F. cristallométrie, < Gr. κρυσταλλος, crystal, + -μετρία, < μέτρον, a measure.] The art or process of measuring the forms of crystals.

Crystallogometry was early recognized as an authorized test of the difference of the substances which nearly resembled each other. Whewell.

crystallogurgy (kris'ta-lōr-jī), n. [< Gr. κρυσταλλος, crystal, + εργον = E. work.] The process of crystallization.

Os. The chemical symbol of caesium.

O. S. An abbreviation of (a) Court of Session; (b) Clerk of the Signet; (c) Custos Signifi, Keeper of the Seal; (d) con sordini (which see).

O. S. A. An abbreviation of (a) Confederate States of America; (b) Confederate States Army.

O. S. N. An abbreviation of Confederate States Navy.

C-spring (sē'spring), n. A carriage-spring shaped like the letter C.

ct. An abbreviation of (a) cent; (b) count; (c) count.

ctenidia, n. Plural of ctenidium.

ctenidial (te-nid'ī-al), a. [< ctenidium + -al.] Pertaining to or having the characters of a ctenidium; as, ctenidial gills or plumes; ctenidial respiration.

Ctenidiobranchia (te-nid'ī-ō-brang'ki-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κτενίδιον, a little comb (see ctenidium), + βράχια, gills.] Same as Ctenidiobranchiata.

Ctenidiobranchiata (te-nid'ī-ō-brang'ki-ā'tā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of ctenidiobranchiatus: see ctenidiobranchiatus.] 1. A suborder or superfamily of xygobranchiate gastropods, having paired ctenidia functioning as gills. It contains the Hahobidae and Fissurellidae, or sea-ears and keyhole-limpets.—2. A suborder of palliate or tectibranchiate opisthobranchiate gastropods, containing those which retain the ctenidia as functional gills, as the Tornatellidae, Bulidae, Aplysiidae, etc.

Ctenidiobranchiate (te-nid'ī-ō-brang'ki-ā'tē), a. [NL., < Ctenidiobranchiatus; as Ctenidiobranchia + -atus: see -ate.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Ctenidiobranchiata.

ctenidia, n. Plural of ctenidium.

ctenidial (te-nid'ī-al), a. [< ctenidium + -al.] Pertaining to or having the characters of a ctenidium; as, ctenidial gills or plumes; ctenidial respiration.

Ctenidiobranchia (te-nid'ī-ō-brang'ki-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κτενίδιον, a little comb (see ctenidium), + βράχια, gills.] Same as Ctenidiobranchiata.

Ctenidiobranchiata (te-nid'ī-ō-brang'ki-ā'tā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of ctenidiobranchiatus: see ctenidiobranchiatus.] 1. A suborder or superfamily of xygobranchiate gastropods, having paired ctenidia functioning as gills. It contains the Hahobidae and Fissurellidae, or sea-ears and keyhole-limpets.—2. A suborder of palliate or tectibranchiate opisthobranchiate gastropods, containing those which retain the ctenidia as functional gills, as the Tornatellidae, Bulidae, Aplysiidae, etc.

Ctenidiobranchiate (te-nid'ī-ō-brang'ki-ā'tē), a. [NL., < Ctenidiobranchiatus; as Ctenidiobranchia + -atus: see -ate.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Ctenidiobranchiata.

ctenidium (te-nid'ī-um), n.; pl. ctenidia (-ā). [NL., < Gr. κτενίδιον, dim. of κτενίς (κτεν-), a comb.] One of the gill-combs, gill-plumes, or primitive branchial organs of mollusks; the respiratory organ of a mollusk in a generalized stage of development. A ctenidium is always a gill, but a gill may not be a ctenidium, since a respiratory function may be assumed by some part of the body which is not ctenidial in a morphological sense.

On either side of the neck there may be seen an oval yellowish body, the rudimentary gills or ctenidia. Trans. Roy. Soc. of Edinburgh, XXXII. 604.

Ctenisa (te-nī'sā), n. [NL., irreg. < Gr. κτενίς (κτεν-), a comb, < κτενίς (κτεν-), a comb.] A genus of spiders, of the family Mygalidae. The species are of large size, and are among those known as trap-door spiders, such as C. oregonensis of Europe and C. californica of the western United States. They are remarkable for forming in the ground a habitation consisting of a long cylindrical tube, protected at the top by a circular door, which is connected to the tube by a hinge. The lid is made of alternate layers of earth and web, and when shut can scarcely be distinguished from the surrounding soil.

ctenobranch (ten'ō-brang'k), a. and n. [< Ctenobranchia.] 1. a. Having a pectinate gill; ctenobranchiate.

II. n. A ctenobranchiate gastropod; one of the Ctenobranchiata.

Are we to accept this view of Lankester and to consider the gill as we find it in most ctenobranchs derived from a ctenidium by modification, or shall we regard the common form of ctenobranch gill as the most primitive? Biol. Lab. of Johns Hopkins, III. 44.

Ctenobranchia (ten'ō-brang'ki-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κτενίς (κτεν-), a comb, + βράχια, gills.] Same as Ctenobranchiata.

Ctenobranchiata (ten'ō-brang'ki-ā'tā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of ctenobranchiatus: see ctenobranchiatus.] In Van der Hoeven's classification, the tenth family of mollusks, characterised by spiral shells, and by having the branchial cavity (in which there are sometimes three branchia, sometimes two, and sometimes only one) composed of numerous leaves like the teeth of a comb, and contained in the last turn of the shell. They have two tentacles and two eyes, the latter often pediculate. The sexes are separate, and the external organs of generation are distinct. There are both fresh- and salt-water species. The whelk is the best-known member of the family. The Ctenobranchiata are now regarded as a suborder of prosobranchiate gastropods, containing upward of 30 families. Also called Pectinobranchiata (which see).

ctenobranchiate (ten'ō-brang'ki-āt), a. [< NL. ctenobranchiatus; as Ctenobranchia + -atus: see -ate.] Having pectinate gills; specifically, pertaining to the Ctenobranchiata.

ctenocyst (ten'ō-sist), n. [NL., < Gr. κτενίς (κτεν-), a comb, + κύστις, a bladder (cyst).] The characteristic sense-organ of the ctenophorans, regarded as probably an auditory capsule; a large vesicle situated at the aboral pole, with a clear fluid and vibratile otoliths. See Ctenophora.

ctenodactyl, ctenodactyle (ten'ō-dak'til), n. An animal of the genus Ctenodactylus.

Otenodactylus (ten'ō-dak'tī-l'ē), n. pl. [NL., < Ctenodactylus + -inus.] A subfamily of hystericomorph rodents, of the family Octodontidae; the comb-rats, so called from the comb-like fringing of the toes. They are exceptional among the hystericomorph rodents in having four back teeth above and below on each side. In Ctenodactylus the molars are three in each half jaw above and below, there being no premolars; and in Perotator, the only other genus, these teeth are minute. The Ctenodactylinae have some relationship with the jerboas, though totally different in appearance. They are confined to Africa.

Otenodactylus (ten'ō-dak'tī-lus), n. [NL., < Gr. κτενίς (κτεν-), a comb, + δακτύλος, a finger or toe.] The typical genus of the subfamily Otenodactylinae. There is but one species, C. massoni, Masson's comb-rat, also called gundi, about the size of a large member of the genus Arvicola, with very small ears, a mere stump of a tail, and lengthened hind limbs.

Otenodipteridae (ten'-ō-dip-ter'-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., short for **Otenodontodipteridae*, < Otenodus (-dōnt-) + Dipterus + -i-da.] In Günther's system of classification, a family of dipnoous fishes, including forms with a heteroecial caudal fin, gular plates, cycloid scales, and two pairs of molars, as well as one pair of vomerine teeth. The species are extinct, and, so far as is known, were peculiar to the Devonian age.

Otenodipterine (ten'-ō-dip-ter'-in), n. One of the Otenodipterini.

Otenodipterini (ten'-ō-dip-ter'-i-ni), n. pl. [NL., short for **Otenodontodipterini*, < Otenodus (-dōnt-) + Dipterus (these two genera composing the group) + -ini.] In Huxley's system of classification, a group of crossopostegian fishes, with etenodont dentition, cycloid scales, and two dorsal fins.

Otenodiscus (ten'-ō-dis'-kus), n. [NL., < Gr. κρεῖς (krei-), a comb, + δίσκος, disk.] A genus of starfishes, of the family Asteriidae, or Asteropectinidae, having a pentagonal form with very short arms. C. crispatus is a North Atlantic species.

Otenodont (ten'-ō-dōnt), a. [Gr. κρεῖς (krei-), a comb, + ὀδών (odon-) = E. tooth.] Possessing etenoid teeth. Huxley.

Otenodus (ten'-ō-dus), n. [NL. (Agassiz, 1838), < Gr. κρεῖς (krei-), a comb, + ὀδών (odon-) = E. tooth.] In Whitl., a genus of dipnoous fishes having the transverse crests of the teeth armed with short teeth and thus somewhat resembling a comb. The species lived during the Carboniferous and Permian periods.

Otenoid (ten'-oid), a. and n. [Gr. κτενοειδής, comb-shaped, < κρεῖς (krei-), a comb, + εἶδος, form.] I. a. 1. Comb-like; pectinate: specifically applied—(a) to a form of scales in fishes in which the posterior margin is pectinate, or beset with small spinules (see cut under scale); (b) to a form of dentition in fishes in which the teeth have comb-like ridges.—2. Pertaining to the Ctenoidoi; having etenoid scales, as a fish.

II. n. A fish with etenoid scales; one of the Ctenoidoi.

Otenoidean (te-noi'-dē-an), a. and n. I. a. Belonging to the order Ctenoidoi.

II. n. A fish of the order Ctenoidoi.

Also Otenoidean.

Otenoidel (te-noi'-dē-i), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κτενοειδής: see Otenoid.] In L. Agassiz's system of classification, one of four orders of the class fishes, containing those in which the scales are etenoid or pectinate. It was the third order of Agassiz's early classification, and contrasted with others called Cycloidei, Ganoidei, and Pisces. It comprised most of the acanthopterygians, but proved to be an entirely artificial group, and is not now in use.

Otenoidian (te-noi'-di-an), a. and n. Same as Otenoidean.

Otenolabridae (ten'-ō-lab'-ri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κρεῖς (krei-), a comb, + NL. Labridae.] A family of acanthopterygian fishes, supposed to be allied to the Labridae, but having etenoid scales: a disused synonym of Pomacentridae.

Otenolabroid (ten'-ō-lab'-roid), a. and n. [Gr. Otenolabrus + -oid.] I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Otenolabridae.

II. n. A fish of the family Otenolabridae; a pomacentrid. Sir J. Richardson.

Otenolabrus (ten'-ō-lā'-brus), n. [NL., < Gr. κρεῖς (krei-), a comb, + Labrus.] A genus of fishes, of the family Labridae, closely related to Labrus, but having a pectinate preoperculum, whence the name. The common cunner is C. asperus. See cut under cunner.

Otenomys (ten'-ō-mis), n. [NL., < Gr. κρεῖς (krei-), a comb, + μυς = E. mouse.] A genus of hystricomorphic rodents, of the family Ocotodontidae and subfamily Ocotodontinae: so named from the comb-like fringe of bristles on the hind feet. It contains several South American species of grayish or brownish animals, usually from 8 to 10 inches long, with a tail from 2 to 3 inches in length, small eyes, rudimentary ears, and a stout form. They resemble guinea-pigs, and are highly fossorial, burrowing like moles, or like the Geomys, which they represent in their economy. The best-known species is C. brasiliensis, called tucu-tucu. Another is C. magellanicus.

Otenophor (ten'-ō-fōr), a. [NL. Otenophorus, < Gr. κρεῖς (krei-), a comb, + φέρω, -bearing, < φέρω = E. bear.] Comb-bearing: applied to the type of structure represented by the Otenophorans among coelenterates.

The Otenophor type has fundamentally the form of a sphere, beset with eight meridional rows of vibratile plates, which, working like oars, serve for locomotion.

Claus, Zoology (trans.), I, 211.

Otenophora<sup>1</sup> (te-nōf'-ō-rā), n. [NL., fem. sing. of Otenophorus: see Otenophor.] 1. A genus of crane-flies, of the family Tipulidae, characterized by the lateral processes of the antennal joints of the male, whence the name. There are 6 European and 7 North American species. The larvae live in dead wood. The genus was founded by Meigen in 1803.

2. A genus of spiders, of the family Therididae, based by Blackwall in 1870 upon a Sicilian species, C. monticola.

Otenophora<sup>2</sup> (te-nōf'-ō-rā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of Otenophorus: see Otenophor.] A class of Coelenterata; formerly, an order of Aculeophora.

They are pellicled gelatinous marine organisms, are radially symmetrical, and swim by means of eight meridional ciliated bands, rows of pectinations or Otenophora, whence the name. In form they are spheroidal or cylindrical, rarely cestoid. They possess an esophageal tube and a gastrovascular system, and often two lateral retractile tentacles, but no corallum. They are hermaphrodite, reproduction being by ova discharged through the mouth. A localized sense organ called a Ctenocyst is present. True nematocysts are usually wanting, but are represented by organs known as stinging or prehensile cells, the base of which is a spirally coiled thread, while the free extremity is enlarged, projecting, and glutinous. The Otenophora are divided by some into four orders, Lobata, Tentaculata, Nematata, and Eurytomata; by others directly into a number of families. Such forms as Eurytomata, Centum, Cyathus, and Beros are severally characteristic of the main divisions. Also called Ctenopoda.

Otenophoral (te-nōf'-ō-rā), a. [As Otenophor + -al.] Comb-bearing: applied to the part or system of organs of the Otenophorans which bear the fringes.

Otenophoran (te-nōf'-ō-rā), a. and n. [Gr. Otenophora + -an.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Otenophora; having the characters of the Otenophora; Otenophorous.

II. n. One of the Otenophora.

An Actinia with only eight mesenteries, and these exceedingly thick, whereby the intermesenteric chambers would be reduced to canals; with two aboral pores instead of the one pore which exists in Ceranthus; and with eight bands of cilia corresponding with the reduced intermesenteric chambers, would have all the essential peculiarities of a Otenophoran.

Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 164.

Otenophore (ten'-ō-fōr), n. [NL. Otenophorus: see Otenophor.] 1. One of the eight fringed or ciliated comb-bearing locomotive organs peculiar to the Otenophora.—2. A member of the class Otenophora; a Otenophoran.

Otenophoric (ten'-ō-fōr'-ik), a. [As Otenophor + -ic.] Same as Otenophorous.

Otenophorous (te-nōf'-ō-rus), a. [As Otenophor + -ous.] Pertaining to or resembling the Otenophora.

In early life . . . the Alciopids are parasitic in the Otenophorous coelenterates, but later become free.

Smithsonian Report, 1881, p. 428.

Otenophyllum (ten'-ō-fil'-um), n. [NL., < Gr. κρεῖς (krei-), a comb, + φύλλον, a leaf.] A genus of fossil plants, named by Schimper in allusion to the comb-like appearance of the leaflets on the frond. It belongs to the cycads, and occurs in rocks of Liassic and Jurassic age in various parts of Europe. The genus Otenophyllum as instituted by Schimper includes various forms previously referred by authors to Pterophyllum, Pterocarpites, and Zamia.

Otenopyschius (ten-op-tik'-i-us), n. [NL., < Gr. κρεῖς (krei-), a comb, + πύχς, a fold.] A genus of fossil selachians of the Devonian and Carboniferous periods, containing sharks now referred to the family Petalodontidae, but formerly to Cestraodontidae.

Otenostomata (ten'-ō-stō-mā-tā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κρεῖς (krei-), a comb, + ὄστρον (ostron-), mouth.] A division of gymnoleptans polyzoans having the cell-opening closed by marginal setae, and no vibracula nor avicularia. It is represented by the families Vesiculariidae and Alcyonidiidae.

Otenostomatous (ten'-ō-stō-mā-tus), a. [Gr. Otenostomata + -ous.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Otenostomata: as, a Otenostomatous polyzoan. Also Otenostomous.

Otenucha (te-nū'-kū), n. [NL. (Kirby, 1857), < Gr. κρεῖς (krei-), a comb, + τέχνη, have.] A genus of moths, of the family Lithosiidae, having 8-jointed palpi, longer than the head, with the first and second equal and the third shorter.

It is distinctively a new-world genus, and the species are found in North and South America.

Othalamidae (tha-lam'-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Othalamus + -i-da.] A family of thoracic cirripedes.

Othalamus (thal'-a-mus), n. [NL., an irreg. form, perhaps a transposition of **Othalamus*, < Gr. ὄθαλας, near the ground, low, akin to χαυαί, on the ground: see chamelon, etc.] The typical genus of the family Othalamidae.

Ou. The chemical symbol of copper (Latin cuprum).

cuadra (kwā'-drā), n. [Sp., a square, < L. quadra, a square, a bit, piece, prop. fem. of (L.L.) quadrus, square: see quadrate, square.] A linear measure of the states of Spanish South America, but unknown in Spain, and consequently to the metrological handbooks. It was originally 400 feet of Castile, afterward 333, and now contains in different states 168, 150, and 80 varas.

In the provinces of the Argentine Republic it contains 150 local varas, except in Tucuman, where it has 168. In the United States of Colombia, Uruguay, etc., it contains 100 varas. It is also used as a square measure. The Argentine cuadra contains over 4 English acres, the Uruguayan barely 2.

cuamara (kwa-mā'-rā), n. [Native name.] The wood of Dipteryx odorata, a leguminous tree of British Guiana, which yields the Tonka bean.

It is hard, tough, and very durable, and is used for shafts, mill-wheels, cogs, etc.

cuartas (kwā'-tās), n. [Sp. cuarta, a fourth part, quarter: see quart, quarter.] An interior kind of Cuban tobacco, used as a filling for cigars. Also called cuartel.

cuartilla (kwā'-tē'-lyā), n. [Sp., dim. of cuarto, fourth: see quart, quarter.] 1. A Spanish measure of capacity, especially for liquids: not to be confounded with the cuartillo. It corresponds to the Arabian makuk, being  $\frac{1}{4}$  of the moyo (Arabic muḥḥ) of Valladolid. It derives its name from being the fourth part of the cantara. According to the standard of Toledo it contains 1.06 United States (old wine) gallons (previous to 1801, 4.125 liters); but on the basis of the aroba menor, used for oil, it is equivalent to only 0.88 of the same gallon.

2. A Spanish dry measure, one fourth of a fanega, equal in Castile to 13.7 liters, or 1½ Winchester pecks. In Buenos Ayres, where it is the chief dry measure, it is 34.32 liters, or 0.97 Winchester bushel. In Entre Rios it is 34.41 liters.

3. A South American measure of land equal to 25,000 square varas.

cuartillo (kwā'-tē'-lyō), n. [Sp., masc. dim. of cuarto, fourth. Cf. cuartilla.] 1. A Spanish liquid measure, one fourth of an azumbre: not to be confounded with the cuartilla. In the last system of Spanish measures it was equal to 0.504 liter, or 1.06 United States (old wine) pints (previous to 1801, or 0.516 liter); but milk was sold by a cuartillo one fourth larger. The cuartillo of Alicante was larger, being 0.722 liter, or 1.525 United States pints.

2. A dry measure of Spain, one fourth of a castrillo, equal to 1.142 liters, or about one sixth of a Winchester peck.—3. A Mexican and South American coin, the fourth part of a real, or about 3½ cents.

cuarto (kwā'-tō), n. [Sp., fourth: see quart, quarter.] 1. A copper coin struck in Spain for circulation in Manila, current as the 160th part of a dollar.—2. A measure of land in Buenos Ayres, since 1870 one fourth of a hectare.

cub (kub), n. [Origin obscure; not recorded in ME.; perhaps Celtic, < Ir. cub, a cub, whelp, dog (cf. Gael. cuain, a litter of whelps), < Ir. Gael. cu = W. of, a dog, = E. hound. The native E. word for cub is whelp, q. v.] 1. The young of certain quadrupeds, especially of the bear, fox, and wolf, also of the lion and tiger (more commonly whelp), and rarely of the dog and some others; a puppy; a whelp.—2. A a, mouth; b, stomach; c, infundibulum; d, horizontal canal; e, one of its branches, dividing at f into two branchlets which open into the longitudinal canal; g, eye; h, parallel with which the ciliated areas run. A, sac of tentacles, with one of its branches; B, canal parallel with stomach; C, tentaculiferous canal; D, canal opening at the aboral aperture; E, a, on each side of F, the ganglion and lenticel or Ctenocyst.

TUCUTUCU (Ctenomys brasiliensis).

coarse or uncouth boy or girl: in contempt or reprobatation.

O, thou dissembling cub! what wilt thou be When time hath sow'd a graine on thy case?

Shak., T. N., v. 1.

Hence—St. An assistant to a physician or surgeon in a hospital. [London, Eng.]

At St. Thomas's Hospital, anno 1703, the grand committee resolved "that no surgeon should have more than three Cubs."

cub<sup>1</sup> (kub), v.; pret. and pp. cubbed, ppr. cubbing. [cub<sup>1</sup>, n.] I. trans. To bring forth, as a cub or cubs.

II. intrans. Contemptuously, to bring forth young, as a woman.—To cub it, to live as or act the part of a cub. [Rare.]

Long before Romulus cubbed it with wolves, and Remus scorned earth-works. T. Witherop, Cecil Dremee, iv.

cub<sup>3</sup> (kub), n. [To be considered with the dim. cubby<sup>3</sup>, q. v.; prob. of I.G. origin; cf. I.G. kubje (dim., > E. cubby), to-kubje, also kübbung, a shed or lean-to for cattle; bekubbelt, narrow, contracted, crowded for room; cf. also D. kub, kubbe, a fish-trap, which suggests a connection with cubby<sup>3</sup>, a creel. In the sense of 'cupboard,' cub may be an abbr. of the old form cubbord.] 1. A stall for cattle; a crib.

I would rather have such in cub or kennel than in my closet or at my table. Landor.

2. A chest; a bin.

When the ore [in copper-smelting] is sufficiently calcined, it is let down into the cubs or vaults beneath. Kneyc. Brit., VI. 348.

3. A cupboard. The great ledger-book of the statutes is to be placed in archivaria among the university charters, and not in any cub of the library. Alp. Laud, Chancellorship at Oxford, p. 182.

cub<sup>4</sup> (kub), v. t. [See cub<sup>3</sup>, n.] To shut up or confine.

To be cubbed up on a sudden, how shall he be perplexed, what shall become of him? Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 211.

Art thou of Bethlem's noble college free,
Stark staring mad, that thou wouldst tempt the sea,
Cub'd in a cabin? Dryden, tr. of Persius's Satires, v.

cubage (kü'bä), n. [cube + -age.] 1. The act or process of determining the cubic contents of something; cubature.

The next chapter on the cubage of the cranial cavity Nature, XXXIII. 4.

2. The cubic contents measured.

Cuban (kü'bän), a. and n. [Cuba + -an.] I. a. Of or pertaining to Cuba, a large island of the West Indies belonging to Spain.

II. n. 1. A native or an inhabitant of Cuba. —2. [i. c.] Same as cubanite.

cubangle (kü'bäng'gl), n. [L. cubus, cube, + angulus, angle.] The solid angle formed by three lines meeting at right angles to one another, as in a corner of a cube.

cubanite (kü'bän-ite), n. [(Cuban + -ite).] A sulphid of copper and iron, of a bronze-yellow color, intermediate between pyrite and chalcopyrite, first found in Cuba. Also called cuban.

cubation<sup>1</sup> (kü-bä'shon), n. [L. cubatio (n.), cubare, lie down.] The act of lying down; a reclining. Ash.

cubator<sup>1</sup> (kü-bä-tör), a. and n. [*ML. *cubatorius* (neut. cubatorium, n., bedstead, bedroom), L. cubator, one who lies down, L. cubare, lie down.] I. a. Lying down; reclining; recumbent.

II. n. A place for lying down; a bedroom; a dormitory. Bailey.

cubature (kü'bä-tür), n. [*NL. as if *cubatura*, L. cubus, cube.] 1. The act or process of finding the solid or cubic contents of a body; cubage.

Hitherto anthropologists have chiefly employed solid particles, such as shot or beads, in the cubature of skulls. Science, V. 409.

2. The cubic contents thus found.

cubboard, n. An obsolete spelling of cupboard.

cubbridge-head (kü'brij-hed), n. [cubbridge, perhaps for cubdordage (< cubbord for cupboard + -age), + head.] Naut., a partition made of boards, etc., across the fore-castle and half-deck of a ship.

cubbyhole (kü'b<sup>3</sup>-höl), n. A small, close apartment, or inclosed space; a closet, or any similar confined place; hence, humorously, a very small house; a cot.

One place, a queer little "cubby-hole," has the appearance of having been a Roman Catholic chapel. O. W. Holmes, Our Hundred Days in Europe, iv.

cubby-house (kü'b<sup>3</sup>-hous), n. A little house, as a doll-house, built by children in play.

We used to build cubby-houses and fix 'em out with broken china and posies. R. T. Cooke, Somebody's Neighbors, p. 6.

cubby-yew (kü'b<sup>3</sup>-i), n. [A corruption of cubia.] Same as crab-eater, 2.

cub-drawn (kü'b<sup>3</sup>-drän), a. Drawn or sucked by cubs; exhausted by sucking; hence, fiercely hungry. [Rare.]

This night, wherein the cub-drawn bear would couch,
The lion and the belly-pinched wolf
Keep their fur dry, unbattered he runs,
And hids what will take all. Shak., Lear, III. 1.

cube (küb), n. [L. cubus = Sp. Pg. It. cubo = G. Dan. kubus, Dan. also kube = Sw. kub, L. cubus, < Gr. κύβος, a die, a cube, a cubic number.] 1. In geom., a regular body with six square faces; a rectangular parallelepiped, having all its edges equal. The cube is used as the measuring unit of solid content, as the square is of superficial content or area. (Cubes of different sides are to one another as the third power of the number of units in one of their sides.)

2. In arith. and alg., the product obtained by multiplying the square of a quantity by the quantity itself; the third power of a quantity: as,  $4 \times 4 \times 4 = 64$ , the cube of 4;  $a^3$  is the cube of  $a$ , or  $a^3$  of  $a$ .—Cube root, the number or quantity of which a given number or quantity is the cube. The easiest way of extracting a cube root is by Horner's method. See method.—Cyclical cube. See cyclical.—Duplication of the cube. See duplication.—Loosie's cube, a cubical vessel filled with hot water and used, under varying conditions, in measuring the reflecting, radiating, and absorbing powers of different substances.—Truncated cube, a tetracosahedron (or fourteen-sided body), formed by cutting off the faces of the cube parallel to those of the coaxial octahedron far enough to leave them regular octagons, while adding eight triangular faces. It is one of the thirteen Archimedean solids.

cube (küb), v. t.; pret. and pp. cubed, ppr. cubing. [Cf. cube, n.] To raise to the cube or third power. See cube, n. 2.

cubeb (kü'beb), n. [ME. corruptly oucube, quibib; = F. cubbe = Pr. Sp. cubeba = Pg. cubebas, cobebas, pl., = It. cubeb, < ML. cubeba, < Ar. Pers. kabāba, Hind. kabāba, kabāb-chini.] The small spicy berry of the Piper Cubeba, a climbing shrub of Java and other East Indian islands. It resembles a grain of pepper, but is somewhat longer. In Cubeb (Piper Cubeba).

aromatic warmth and pungency cubeba are far inferior to pepper; but they are much valued for their use in diseases of the urinary system and of the bronchial tubes. Sometimes called cubeb pepper.—African cubeba, the fruit of Piper Clusii, which has the hot taste and odor of black pepper, without the peculiar medicinal properties of East Indian cubeba.

cubebic (kü'beb'ik), a. [Cf. cubeb + -ic.] Pertaining to or derived from cubeba.—Cubebic acid,  $C_{10}H_{10}O_4$ , an amorphous yellow substance contained in cubeba, to which the diuretic effect of the drug is said to be due.

cubebite (kü'beb'it), n. [Cf. cubeb + -ite.] An odorless substance ( $C_{10}H_{10}O_4$ ) crystallizing in small needles or scales, found in cubeba. Physiologically it seems to be inactive.

cube-ore (kü'b<sup>3</sup>-ör), n. A mineral crystallizing in cubic crystals of a greenish color; a hydrous arseniate of iron. Also called pharmacosiderite.

cube-powder (kü'b<sup>3</sup>-pou'dér), n. Gunpowder made in large cubical grains, and burning more slowly than small or irregular grains, used in heavy ordnance. It is made by cutting press-cake in two directions at right angles to each other, so as to produce cubes with edges 0.75 inch in length. There are about 72 grains to the pound. Also called cubical powder.

The shaping of the earth from the nebulous cubhood of its youth . . . to its present form. Huxley, Lay Sermons, p. 243.

cubic (kü'bik), a. and n. [= F. cubique = Sp. cubico = Pg. It. cubico, < L. cubicus, < Gr. κύβητος, < κύβη, a die, cube; see cube.] I. a. 1. Having the form of a cube.—2. Solid; three-dimensional: said of a unit of volume related to a unit of length of the same name as a cube is related to its edge. Thus, a cubic yard is the volume or solid contents of a cube whose edges are each a yard long. Abbreviated c.

3. In alg. and geom., being of the third order, degree, or power.—Cubic alum. See alum.—Cubic curve. See curve.—Cubic or cubical determinant. See determinant.—Cubic elliptic, a curve whose equation is  $ay^3 = x^2(b - x)$ . It is a cuspidal cubic tangent to the line at infinity.—Cubic equation, in alg., an equation in which the highest power of the unknown quantity is a cube.—Cubic number, cubic quantity. Same as cube.

2. Cubic surface, a surface whose point-equation is of the third degree; a surface cut by every line in space in three points, real or imaginary.—Cubic system, in crystal., same as isometric system. See crystallography.—Plane cubic parabola, a cubic of the form  $ax^3 = y^2$ . It is a cubic of the third class, having a cusp at infinity and a single point of inflection (which is a center).—Twisted cubic curve. See twisted cubic, below.

II. n. In math., a cubical quantity, equation, or curve.—Binary, ternary, quaternary cubic, a homogeneous entire function of the third degree, containing two, three, or four variables.—Characteristics of a cubic. See characteristic.—Circular cubic, cuspidal cubic. See the adjectives.—Twisted cubic, a curve in space which is cut by every plane in three points, real or imaginary.

cubica (kü'bi-kä), n. [Origin uncertain.] A fine kind of shalloon used for linings, ranging in width from 32 to 36 inches. Dict. of Needlework.

cubical (kü'bi-käl), a. 1. Of or pertaining to a cube.—2. Cubic.—Cubical coefficient of expansion. See coefficient.—Cubical ellipsis, hyperbola, hyperbolic parabola, parabola, twisted cubics distinguished by their intersections with the plane at infinity: the ellipses having only one real intersection, the hyperbolas three, all distinct, the hyperbolic parabolas three, of which two fall together, and the parabolas three, all coincident.—Cubical figure, a figure in three dimensions.—Cubical powder. Same as cube powder.

cubically (kü'bi-käl-i), adv. In a cubic manner; by cubing; with reference to the cube or its properties.

Sixty-four . . . made by multiplying . . . four cubically. Dr. H. Murr, Conjectura Cabbalistica, p. 217.

cubicalness (kü'bi-käl-nes), n. The character of being cubical.

cubicite, cubisite (kü'bi-sit, -zit), n. [Cf. cubic + (ceol)ite, or (cubi)c + (silit)ite.] Cubic zeolite, or analcime.

cubiclet (kü'bi-kl), n. [Also cubicule; < L. cubiculum, a bedroom, < cubare, lie down.] A bedroom; a chamber. [Rare.]

Two messengers from the flock of cardinals, invading the sanctity of his [Pope's] nightly cubicle, broke his slumbers with the news of his proffered designation. R. W. Dixon, Hist. Church of Eng., xvii cubicone (kü'bi-kön), n. [Cf. cubic + cone.] A conical surface of the third degree.

cubicontravariant (kü'bi-kon-trä-vä'ri-ant), n. [Cf. cubic + contravariant.] A contravariant of the third degree.

cubicovariant (kü'bi-kö-vä'ri-ant), n. [Cf. cubic + covariant.] A covariant of the third degree.

cubicroticoid (kü'bi-krit'i-koid), n. [Cf. cubic + criticoid.] A criticoid of the third degree.

cubacula, n. Plural of cubiculum.

cubicular (kū-bik'ū-lār), a. [L. cubicularis, also cubicularium; see cubicular.] Belonging to a bedchamber; private.

Tho' there be Rules and Rubrics in our Liturgy sufficient to guide every one in the performance of all holy duties, yet I believe every one hath some mode and model or formula of his own, especially for his private cubicular devotion. Hoswell, Letters, I v. 32.

cubicular (kū-bik'ū-lā-ri), a. and n. [ME. cubicular, n.; = OF. cubicularis = Pr. cubiculari = Sp. Pg. cubiculario = It. cubiculario, < L. cubicularius, of or pertaining to a bedchamber, as a noun a chamber-servant, valet-de-chambre, < cubiculum, a bedchamber; see cubicl.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to a bedchamber. —2. Fitted for the posture of lying down. [Rare.]

Custom, by degrees, changed their cubicular beds into discubitory. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., v. 6.

cubicle (kū-bi-kūl), n. [See cubicle.] Same as cubicle.

cubiculot (kū-bik'ū-lō), n. [For It. cubiculo, < L. cubiculum: see cubicle.] A bedchamber; a chamber.

Sir And. Where shall I find you?

Sir To. We'll call thee at the cubiculo.

Shak., T. N., III. 2.

cubiculum (kū-bik'ū-lum), n.; pl. cubicula (-lā). [ML., < L. cubiculum, a bedchamber; see cubicle.] I. n. 1. In archaeol., a burial-chamber having round its walls loculi or compartments for the reception of the dead. See catacomb. —2. A mortuary chapel attached to a church.

cubiform (kū-bi-form), a. [L. cubus, cube, + forma, shape.] Having the form of a cube; cubical.

The genus Amphitetras . . . is chiefly characterized by the cubiform shape of its frustules.

W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 298.

cubivariant (kū-bi-vā-ri-ant), n. [Cub(ito) + variant.] In math., an invariant of the third degree in the coefficients of a quantic.

cubit (kū-bit), n. [ME. cubit, cubito = OF. coude, coute, cuto, F. coude = Pr. coude, code, elbow, = Obsp. oobdo, Sp. codo, elbow, a measure, cubito, the ulna, = Sp. cubito, the ulna, a measure, covado, an ell (cf. coto, a small piece), = It. cubito, cubit, elbow, angle, = Wall. cot, < L. cubitum, rarely cubitus, the elbow, the distance from the elbow to the end of the middle finger, an ell, earlier in Gr. κύβιτρον, also κύβιτρον, described as Sicilian (the Attic word being ὠλεκράνον or ὠλέων = L. ulna = E. ell), prob. from ὠλ, lit. a bending, < cubere (bend), recline, lie, = Gr. κύνειν, bend; cf. Gael. cubach, bent.] I. In anat.: (a) The forearm or antibrachium; the arm from the elbow to the wrist.

Putte thou aside clothes . . . vnder the cubit of thin hounds [translation of Latin cub cubito].

Wyclif, Jer. xxxviii. 12 (Purv.).

(b) The inner bone of the forearm; the ulna. —2. A linear unit derived from the length of the forearm. The natural cubit used for measuring cloth was probably originally the length from the end of the thumb-nail to the elbow, though no cubit so short is known. The royal Egyptian cubit is, of all units of measure or weight, that one whose use can be traced back in history the furthest; for it was employed in the construction of the pyramids of Gizeh, perhaps 3600 a. C. From a number of Egyptian measuring-sticks found in the tombs, this cubit is ascertained to be equal to 50.64 English inches, or 524 millimeters. It was divided into seven palms, instead of six as the ordinary cubit was, and this was probably owing to measurement along walls with the forearm having been made by placing the hand behind the elbow and leaving it on the wall until the arm was laid down again. The Egyptian and Roman are the only ancient cubits of importance whose lengths are undisputed. The Roman cubit was 14 Roman feet, or 17.4 English inches. Two cubits are mentioned in the Bible, for Ezekiel speaks of a cubit which is a cubit and a hand-breadth. The shorter of these cubits was probably that which in Deuteronomy is called the cubit of a man; the longer one, that which in Chronicles is called the cubit after the first measure — that is, the most ancient cubit. Julian of Ascalon speaks of two cubits in the ratio of 23 to 25. But we have no accurate knowledge of the lengths of the Hebrew cubits, since the cubit of the temple is estimated variously by high authorities, as from 19 to 26 inches. There are many cubits, ancient and modern, of widely different values.

And see schulle understonde, that the croos of oure Lord was crynt Cubytas long, and the overthwart piece was of lengthe thre Cubytas and an half.

Manderille, Travels, p. 12.

Four cubites [was] the breadth of it [Og's iron bedstead], after the cubit of a man. Deut. iii. 11.

3. In entom., one of the veins, nerves, or ribs of an insect's wing; a cubital rib, succeeding the radius or sector. See phrases under cubitus. cubital (kū-bi-tal), a. [L. cubitalis, < cubitus, elbow; see cubit.] I. In anat., pertaining to the forearm, or to the ulna; antibrachial; ulnar. —2. In entom., pertaining to the cubit or cubitus of an insect's wing: as, cubital cells; the cubital rib. —3. Of the length or measure of a cubit.

4. Growing on the cubit, antibrachium, or forearm, as feathers of a bird's wing: as, the cubital coverts. See covert, n., 6.

The principal modes of imbrication of the cubital coverts, as observed in healthy living birds of all the leading carinate forms. Nature, XXXIII. 651.

cubital (kū-bi-tal), n. [L. cubital, an elbow, cushion, < cubitus, elbow; see cubit, and cubital, a.] I. A bolster or cushion to rest the elbow upon, as used by persons reclining at meals in Roman antiquity, and by invalids, etc. —2. [Cubital, a.] The third joint of the pedipalp of a spider. It is generally short.

cubit-bone (kū-bit-bōn), n. The cubital bone; the ulna.

cubited (kū-bi-ted), a. [Cubit + -ed.] Having the measure of a cubit: used in composition. [Rare.]

The twelve-cubited man. Sheldon, Miracles, p. 308.

cubit-fashion (kū-bit-fash'ōn), adv. In the mode of measuring with the forearm, on which the cubit is founded.

The olivine was roughly spoken of as equal to the Russian arshine, and measured cubit-fashion, from the elbow to the end of the forefinger.

Lavinski, Russian Central Asia, II. 36.

cubiti, n. Plural of cubitus.

cubitidigital (kū-bi-ti-dij'i-tal), a. [L. cubitum, elbow, + digitus, finger, + -al.] In anat., of or pertaining to the forearm and to the fingers.

cubitiere (F. pron. kū-bē-ti-ē), n. [F., < L. cubitum, elbow; see cubit.] In medieval armor, a general name for the defense of the elbow when forming a piece separate from the covering of the arm.

In the thirteenth century it consisted of a roundel, slightly hollowed in the form of a cup, and held over the hauberk or brigune by a strap passing round the elbow-joint; later it became more conical, and in the fourteenth century another plate was added, covering the side of the elbow-joint. When the complete brass-armor was introduced, toward the close of the fourteenth century, the cubitiere formed a part of this, and was regularly articulated; but the old cup-shaped form or some modification of it was retained by those who could not afford the expense of the brass-armor of plate. See cuts under armor.

cubitocarpal (kū-bi-tō-kār'pal), a. [L. cubitum, elbow, + NL. carpus, q. v., + -al.] In anat., pertaining to the cubit or forearm and to the carpus or wrist: as, the cubitocarpal articulation. In man this joint is called radio-carpal.

cubitus (kū-bi-tus), n.; pl. cubiti (-tī). [L.: see cubit.] Same as cubit. —Cubitus anticus, in entom., the anterior cubital or discoidal rib. —Cubitus posticus, in entom., the posterior cubital or submedian rib. Clausen.

cubistia, n. See cubicula.

cubla (kū-bā), n. [NL., perhaps of South African origin.] A book-name of a South African shrike, the Dryocopus cubla. Also cubla-shrike.

cubo-biquadratic (kū-bō-bi-kwōd-rat'ik), a. In math., of the seventh degree.

cuboctahedral (kū-bō-ok-tā-hē'dral), a. [C. cuboctahedron + -al.] Relating to or having the shape of a cuboctahedron. Also cubo-octahedral.

cuboctahedron (kū-bō-ok-tā-hē'drōn), n. [C. cube + octahedron.] A solid with fourteen faces formed by cutting off the corners of a cube parallel to the coaxial octahedron far enough to leave the original faces squares, while adding eight triangular faces at the truncations. The same result is obtained by cutting off the corners of the octahedron far enough to leave the original faces triangles. It is one of the thirteen Archimedean solids. Also cubo-octahedron. —Truncated cuboctahedron, a solid with twenty-six sides formed by the faces of the coaxial cube, octahedron, and rhombic dodecahedron, in such proportions that the faces belonging to the cube become regular octagons, those belonging to the octahedron hexagons, and those belonging to the dodecahedron squares. It is one of the thirteen Archimedean solids.

cubo-cube (kū-bō-kūb), n. [NL. cubocubus, < LGr. κύβωκύβος, the product of two cube numbers, < Gr. κύβος, cube, + κύβος, cube.] In math., the sixth power of a number; the square of the cube: thus, 64 is the cubo-cube of 2.

cubocubic (kū-bō-kūb'ik), a. In math., of the sixth degree. —Cubocubic root, a sixth root.

cubo-cubo-cube (kū-bō-kū-bō-kūb), n. [NL. cubocubocubus, < Gr. κύβος + κύβος + κύβος, cube.] In math., the ninth power of a number; the cube of the cube: thus, 512 is the cubo-cubo-cube of 2.

Cuboctahedron.

cubo-cuneiform (kū-bō-kū-nē-i-fōrm), a. [C. cubo (id.) + cuneiform.] In anat., pertaining to the cuboid and to the cuneiform bones: as, a cubo-cuneiform articulation or ligament.

cubo-dodecahedral (kū-bō-dō-dek-a-hē'dral), a. [L. cubus, cube, + dodecahedral.] Presenting the two forms, a cube and a dodecahedron.

cuboid (kū'boid), a. and n. [Gr. κύβοειδής, cube-shaped, < κύβος, cube, + είδος, form.] I. a. Resembling a cube in form.

II. n. In anat., the outermost bone of the distal row of tarsal bones, or bones of the instep, supporting the heads of the fourth and fifth metatarsal bones: so called from its cubic form in man. It is regarded as consisting of or as representing the fourth and fifth distal tarsal bones of the typical tarsus. See cut under foot.

cuboidal (kū-boi'dal), a. [Cuboid + -al.] Same as cuboid.

True cork is destitute of intercellular spaces, its cells being of regular shape (generally cuboidal) and fitted closely to each other. Bessey, Botany, p. 123.

cuboides (kū-boi'dēs), n. [NL., < Gr. κύβοειδής, cuboid; see cuboid.] In anat., the cuboid bone; the cuboid.

cuboite (kū'bō-it), n. [L. cubus, a cube, + -ite.] So called because it sometimes occurs in cubic crystals.] Same as analcite.

cubomancy (kū-bō-man-si), n. [Gr. κύβορ, a cube, die, + μαντεία, divination.] Divination by means of dice; dice-throwing.

Cubomedusae (kū-bō-mē-dū'sē), n. pl. [NL., < L. cubus, a cube, + NL. Medusae, q. v.] A family of acraspedal medusans or jelly-fishes, having a somewhat cubical figure in consequence of the arrangement of principal parts in fours. Thus, there are four perispherical marginal bodies, containing endodermal ocytocytes, acoustic clubs, and one or more eyes; four wide square perispherical pouches of the gastral cavity; and four pairs of leaf-shaped gonads, developed from the subumbrellar endoderm of the gastral pouches, fixed by their margins to the four interradial septa and freely projecting into the gastral cavity. Preferably written Cubomedusae, as a family name.

cubomedusan (kū-bō-mē-dū'san), a. and n. I. a. Having the cuboid character of the Cubomedusae; of or pertaining to these scaphopods.

II. n. A jelly-fish of the family Cubomedusae.

cubo-octahedral (kū-bō-ok-tā-hē'dral), a. [C. cubo-octahedron + -al.] Same as cuboctahedral.

cubo-octahedron (kū-bō-ok-tā-hē'drōn), n. [L. cubus, cube, + NL. octahedron, q. v.] Same as cuboctahedron.

Cubostomus (kū-bōs'tō-mēs), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κύβος, cube, + στόμα, mouth.] A suborder of Discomedusae having the parts in sets of four or eight, and the mouth simple, at the end of a rudimentary manubrium, and without any processes. It is represented by such forms as Nautilothoe. Preferably written Cubostomata.

cubostomous (kū-bōs'tō-mus), a. [Cubostoma + -ous.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Cubostoma.

cuca (kū'kā), n. A variant form of coca.

The pretious leaf called cuca. De La Vega.

cucaine (kū'kā-in), n. [C. cuca + -ine.] A variant form of cocaine.

cuchia (kū'chi-ā), n. [NL.; from native name.] A fish, Amphiprion cucchia, found lurking in holes in the marshes of Bengal, of a sluggish and torpid nature, and remarkable for tenacity of life. See Amphiprion.

cuck, v. t. [*ME. *cucken*, **cukken*, **coken*; recorded only in the verbal n. cucking, and in comp. cucking-stool, cuck-stool, q. v.; prob. < leel. kuka, equiv. to E. cack: see cack.] To ease one's self at stool.

cuck<sup>2</sup>, v. t. [Inferred from cucking-stool, after the assumed analogy of duck<sup>1</sup> as related to ducking-stool.] To put in the cucking-stool.

Follow the law: and you can cuck me, spare not. Middleton and Dekker, Boaring Girl, v. 2.

cuck<sup>4</sup> (kuk), v. t. [E. dial., also cook; origin obscure.] To cast; throw; chuck. [North. Eng.]

Cook me the ball. Gross.

cucking-stool (kuk'ing-stōl), n. [ME. cucking-stol, cucking-stole, coking-stole, etc.; cf. equiv. cuck-stool, < ME. cuckestole, kukstole, cockstole, etc., orig. in the form of a close-stool (in the earliest mention called oathedra stercoria); < cucking, verbal n. of cuck<sup>1</sup>, v., + stool.] Formerly, a chair in which an offender, as a common brawler or soid, or a woman of disorderly life, or a defaulting brewer or baker, was placed, to be hooted at or pelted by the mob. The cuckling stool has been frequently confounded with the ducking stool, but the former did not of itself admit of the ducking of its occupant, although in conjunction with the tumbrel it was sometimes used for that purpose.

MHG. gouch, G. gouch = AS. goc = Iscl. gautr, > E. gouch, a cuckoo: see goul) and in many other tongues, in various forms of the type ku-ku, being a direct imitation of the characteristic cry of the bird. A similar imitation occurs also in coo, cook<sup>2</sup>, cock<sup>1</sup>, oak, etc. (see these words) The forms, being imitative, do not conform closely to the rules of historical development. In early superstitions the cuckoo was regarded as of evil omen, and enters into various imprecations and proverbs as an embodiment of the devil. It was also a term of reproach or contempt equivalent to fool (cf. gouch, in similar use), and with reference to its habit of laying its eggs in other birds' nests is the subject of endless allusion in early literature see cuckold<sup>1</sup>] 1 A bird of the family (Cuculidae, and especially of the subfamily Cuculina or genus (Cuculus so called from its characteristic note. The common cuckoo of Europe is Cuculus canorus about 14 inches long with xygodytyl feet broad rounded tail curved bill and ashly plumage varied with black and white. It is notorious for its parasitism, having the habit common to many birds of the family of depositing its eggs in the nests of other birds, is chiefly smaller than itself, and causing its young to be reared by the foster parents — a condition generally entailing the destruction of their own progeny. The remarkable cries which have given the bird its imitative names in many languages are the love notes uttered only during the mating season. The species of cuckoo are very numerous and are found in most parts of the world they are not all parasitic. There are several subfamilies of Cuculidae and many genera. (See Cuculidae) The American tree cuckoo are arboreal, not parasitic and are confined to America, they are also called hook-bill cuckoo as a term not of special pertinence. The ground cuckoo are American birds of terrestrial habits. The cuckoo cuckoo are old world forms as are also the male lark-billed or spur-billed cuckoo also called the pheasant cuckoo.

Cuculidae (ku-ku'p-de), n pl [NL, < Cuculus + -ida] A family of clavicorn Coleoptera or beetles.

The dorsal segments of the abd men are partly membranous ventral segments are thin the tarsal joints of the antennae are moderate or small the palpi are approximate at the base the anterior coxae are rounded or oval and not prominent the posterior coxae are not approximate and are separated the ventral segments are subequal and the middle coxal cavities open externally. The Cuculidae are mostly small dark colored beetles living under bark or in decaying wood some however infest food stuffs especially those of a farinaceous character. The family has been divided into Proscaphina, Cuculina, Hemiprosaphina, Bronchocoma and Sylvestria.

a larva b, beetle (nearly full size) c, c, c, large (1 inch ant 1 1/2 inch wing) d, anal joint of larva e, head of larva

Cuculus (ku'ku-jus), n [NL; of S Amer. origin.] The typical genus of the family Cuculidae, having the first tarsal joints very short.

C. olivaceus is a characteristic example. It is scarlet above with finely punctured surface; the eyes and antennae are black.

Cuculi (kū-kū-lī), n. pl. [NL., pl. of L. cuculus, a cuckoo; see cuckoo and Cuculus.] A superfamily of coecygomorphic birds, of the conventional order Picariæ, including several families related to the Cuculidae.

Cuculidae (kū-kū-lī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cuculus + -idae.] A family of yoke-toed picarian birds, typical of the group Coecygomorpha or Cuculiformes; the cuckoos. The feet are permanently syndactyl by reversion of the fourth toe, yet the birds are not of scansorial habits. The bill is moderate, generally curved, with a deflected tip and no cere; the palate is desmognathous; the legs are homologous; the carotids are two in number; the oil gland is nude, and oesca are present. It is a large and important family, with about 300 species, showing various minor modifications of structure corresponding in a measure with faunal areas; it is consequently divided into a number of subfamilies. The Cuculinae are a peculiar Madagascarian type. The Phoenicophaea are confined to the old world, as are the Crotophaginae or spur-heeled cuckoos, and the Cuculinae or typical cuckoos. (See cut under cuckoo.) America has three types, those of the Coccyzinae or tree-cuckoos, the Saururinae or ground-cuckoos, and the Crotophaginae or gregarious cuckoos. (See cuts under ant. Coccyzus, and chaparral-cuck.) The birds of the genus Indicator, sometimes included in the family, are now usually elevated to the rank of a distinct family. In their economy the Cuculidae are noted for their parasitism, which runs through many, though not all, of the genera composing the family.

Cuculiform (kū-kū-lī-fōrm), a. [NL. cuculiformis, < L. cuculus, a cuckoo, + forma, shape.] Cuculine; cuckoo-like in form or structure; coecygomorphic.

Cuculiformes (kū-kū-lī-fōrm' mēs), n. pl. [NL., pl. of cuculiformis; see cuculiform.] A superfamily of cuculiform picarian birds, approximately equivalent to Coecygomorpha, separating the cuculine or cuckoo-like birds on the one hand from the Cypseliformes, and on the other from the Piciformes. It contains the whole of the conventional order Picariæ, excepting the goatsuckers, swifts, and hummingbirds, and the woodpeckers and wrynecks.

Cuculinae (kū-kū-lī-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Cuculus + -inae.] 1. In ornith.: (a) A subfamily of Cuculidae, including the typical cuckoos, such as the Cuculus canorus of Europe. See cut under cuckoo. (b) In Nitzsch's system of classification, a major and miscellaneous group of picarian or cuculiform birds of no fixed limits, including, besides cuckoos, the trogons, goatsuckers, and sundry others. [Not in use in this sense.]—2. In entom., a well-marked group of naked, sometimes wasp-like, parasitic bees, having no polleniferous brushes or plates; the cuckoo-bees. See cuckoo-bee.

Cuculines (kū-kū-lī-nē), a. [NL. cuculinus, < L. cuculus, a cuckoo; see cuckoo, and cf. cuculinar.] Cuckoo-like; cuculiform; coecygomorphic; pertaining or related to the cuckoos.

Cuculosa (kū-kū-lē-ā), n. [NL., < L. cucullus, a cap, hood; see cowl.] A genus of asiphonate bivalves, of the family Arctidae, or ark-shells, having a somewhat square gibbous shell with hinge-teeth oblique at the middle and parallel with the hinge at the ends. The species are chiefly fossil.

Cucullaris (kū-kū-lā-riā), n.; pl. cucullares (-rēs). [NL., < L. cucullus, a cap, hood; see cowl.] The cowl-muscle or trapezius of man: so called because, taken with its fellow of the opposite side, it has been likened to a monk's hood or cowl. See trapezius.

Cucullate, cucullated (kū-kū-lāt, -ā-ted), a. [LL. cucullatus, < L. cucullus, a cap, hood; see cowl.] 1. Hooded; cowlled; covered as with a hood.—2. In bot., having the shape or semblance of a hood; wide at the top and drawn to a point below, in the shape of a cornet of paper; like or likened to a hood: as, a cucullate leaf or nestary. In mones it is specifically applied to a conical calyptra cleft at one side.—3. In zool., hooded; having the head shaped, marked, or colored as if hooded or cowlled: specifically applied, in entom., to the prothorax of an insect when it is elevated or otherwise shaped into a kind of hood or cowl for the head.

They (the cicadas and the grasshopper) are differently cucullated or capuched upon the head and back.

Sir T. Brown, Vulg. Err., v. 3.

Cucullately (kū-kū-lāt-lī), adv. In a cucullate manner; in the shape or with the appearance of a hood.

Cuculiform (kū-kū-lī-fōrm), a. [LL. cucullus, a cap, hood (see cowl), + forma, shape.] Resembling a hood or cowl in form or appearance; cucullate.

Cuculites (kū-kū-līt), n. [NL. cuculites (Schroter, 1764, in form cuculites), < L. cucullus, a cowl; see cucullus.] A name formerly given to fossil species of cones or cone-like shells.

Cucullus (kū-kū-l' us), n. [L., a cowl; see cowl.] 1. A cowl or monk's hood: as in the proverb Cucullus non facit monachum (the cowl does not make the monk). See hood.—2. [NL.] In zool. and anat., a formation or coloration of the head like or likened to a hood.

Cuculoides (kū-kū-lōi-dē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Cuculus + -oides.] The Cuculidae and Muscophagidae, or cuckoos and touracoons, combined to constitute a superfamily.

Cuculoides (kū-kū-lōi-dēz), n. pl. [NL., < L. cuculus, cuckoo, + Gr. idos, form.] In Blyth's system (1849), a superfamily of his Zygodaetili, in which the Leptosomidae and Bucconidae are united with the Cuculidae proper.

Cuculus (kū-kū-l' us), n. [NL., < L. cuculus, a cuckoo; see cuckoo.] The typical genus of the family Cuculidae, formerly more comprehensive than the family as at present constituted, but now restricted to forms congeneric with Cuculus canorus, the type of the genus. See cut under cuckoo.

cucumber (kū-kūm-bōr), n. [E. dial. cowcumber, formerly in good literary use, being the proper mod. representative of the ME. form (cucumber, being a reversion to the L. form); < ME. cucumbr, cucumer, cocumber = OF. cocombre, F. cocombre = Pr. cogombre = Sp. cocombro = It. cocomero, < ML. cucumer, L. cucumis (cucumer), a cucumber.] 1. A common running garden-plant, (Cucumis sativus). It is a native of southern Asia, but has been cultivated from the earliest times in all civilized countries. See Cucumis.

This seed with cucumber roots ground
Lete stoep, and save of every myse (misap) that are.

Palladius, Rhusboudrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 38.

2. The long, fleshy fruit of this plant, eaten as a cooling salad when green, and also used for pickling. (See gherkin). The stem-end is usually very bitter, as is the whole fruit in some uncultivated varieties.

We remember the fish which we did eat in Egypt freely;
the cucumbers, and the melons. Num. xl. 6.

3. A common name of various plants of other genera.—Bitter cucumber, the colocynth, Citrullus Colocynthis.—Cool as a cucumber, very cool; figuratively, collected; entirely self-possessed.

When the wife of the great Socrates threw a . . . tawp at his erudite head he was as cool as a cucumber.

Colman the Younger, Heir-at-Law.

Creeping cucumber, Melothria pendula, a delicate low cucurbitaceous climber of the southern United States, bearing oval green berries.—Cucumber-oil, a drying-oil obtained from the seeds of the pumpkin, squash, melon, etc.—Indian cucumber, see cucumber-root.—One-seeded or star cucumber, the common name in the United States of the Sicyon angulatus, a climbing cucurbitaceous annual, bearing clusters of dry, ovate, prickly, one-seeded fruits.—Serpent-cucumber, a variety of the common muskmelon with very long fruit.—Snake-cucumber, the Trichosanthis Anguina, a tall cucurbitaceous climber of the East Indies, with ornamental sinuate-petaled flowers and a snake-like fruit, 8 or a foot long, turning red when ripe.—Squirting or wild cucumber, the Echium Elaterrum. See Echium. (See also sea-cucumber.)

cucumber-root (kū-kūm-bēr-rōt), n. A liliaceous plant of the United States, Medeola Virginica, allied to Trillium, having two whorls of leaves on the slender stem, and an umbel of recurved flowers. The tuberous rootstock has the taste of the cucumber, whence the common name of Indian cucumber. It has been used as a remedy for dropsy.

cucumber-tree (kū-kūm-bēr-trē), n. 1. The common name in the United States for several species of Magnolia, especially M. acuminata and M. cordata, from the shape and size of the fruit. The long-leaved cucumber-tree is M. Fraseri; the large-leaved, M. macrophylla.—2. The bilimbi, Averrhoa Bilimbi, of the East Indies. See Averrhoa.

cucumiform (kū-kū-mi-fōrm), a. [L. cucumis, a cucumber, + forma, shape.] Shaped like a cucumber; cylindrical and tapering toward the ends, and either straight or curved.

Cucumis (kū-kū-mis), n. [NL., < L. cucumis, a cucumber; see cucumber.] A genus of plants, natural order Cucurbitaceae, containing about 25 species, natives of warm regions. They are annual or perennial herbs, with hairy stems and leaves, running over the ground or climbing. They have yellow flowers, and a round or roundish, cylindrical, or angular fleshy fruit. The most widely known species are C. sativus, the cucumber, and C. Melo, which yields all the different varieties of the muskmelon. The fruits of some of the species have a very bitter taste and are reputed to be purgative.

cucupha (kū-kū-fā), n. A sort of coif or cap, with a double bottom inclosing a mixture of aromatic powders, having cotton for an excipient. It was formerly used as a powerful cephalic. Dunghson.

cucurbit, cucurbita (kū-kēr-bit), n. [F. cucurbita, < L. cucurbita, a gourd; see gourd.] 1. A chemical vessel originally shaped like a gourd, but sometimes shallow, with a wide mouth, used in distillation. It may be made of copper, glass, tin, or stoneware. With its head or cover it constitutes the alembic. See alembic.

I have . . . distilled quicksilver in a cucurbita, fitted with a capacious glass-head. Boyle, Colours.

2. A gourd-shaped vessel for holding liquids. Oriental water-jars are often of this form, and porcelain and earthenware vases of China and Japan are frequently so shaped.

3. A cupping-glass. cucurbit (kū-kēr-bit), n. A plant of the natural order Cucurbitaceae.

Cucurbita (kū-kēr-bi-tā), n. [NL., < L. cucurbita, a gourd, whence ult. E. gourd; see gourd.] A genus of plants, natural order Cucurbitaceae. There are about a dozen species, annuals or perennials, inhabiting the warmer regions of the world. They are creeping herbs, with lobed and cordate leaves, large yellow flowers, and fleshy, generally very large, fruits. Nearly all the perennial species are natives of Mexico and the adjacent regions on the north, and have usually large tuberous or fusiform roots. The three annual species originated probably in southern Asia, have long been in cultivation, and have developed many very different forms. It is nearly certain that these species were extensively cultivated in America long before its discovery by Columbus. C. Pepo and its varieties yield the pumpkin, the warty, long-neck, and crockneck squashes and vegetable marrow, and the egg- or orange-gourd. C. maxima yields the various varieties of winter squash, often of great size, the turban-squash, etc. C. moschata is the source of the musky, China, or barley squash.

Cucurbitaceae (kū-kēr-bi-tā-sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < cucurbita + -aceae.] A natural order of poly-petalous dicotyledonous plants, with the petals more or less united into a monopetalous corolla, and containing climbing or trailing species with unisexual flowers, scabrous stems and leaves, and a more or less pulpy fruit. An acid principle pervades the order; when this principle is greatly diffused the fruits are edible, often delicious, but when concentrated, as in the colocynth and bryony, they are dangerous or actively poisonous. The order includes 80 genera and about 600 species, the most useful genera being Cucumis (the cucumber), Cucurbita (the pumpkin and squash), Citrullus (the watermelon and colocynth), and Lagenaria (the gourd). Species of various other genera yield edible fruits or possess medicinal properties.

cucurbitaceous (kū-kēr-bi-tā-sē-ē), a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Cucurbitaceae.

cucurbital (kū-kēr-bi-tal), a. [NL. < Cucurbita + -al.] Of or pertaining to the genus Cucurbita or the order Cucurbitaceae: as, the cucurbital alliance of Lindley.

cucurbita, n. See cucurbit.

Cucurbita (kū-kēr-bit' ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Cucurbita + -ae.] A tribe of Cucurbitaceae.

cucurbitin (kū-kēr-bi-tin), n. [NL. < Cucurbita + -in.] A doubtful alkaloid from the seeds of Cucurbita Pepo.

cucurbitinus (kū-kēr-bi-tī-nus), n.; pl. cucurbitini (-ni). [NL., < L. cucurbitinus, n., like a gourd, < cucurbita, a gourd; see gourd.] A joint or link of a tapeworm; a cestoid sodid; a proglottis.

cucurbitive (kū-kēr-bi-tiv), a. [NL. < cucurbita, a gourd, + -ive.] Shaped like the seeds of a gourd: said specifically of certain worms. Imp. Diet.

cod (kud), n. [*< ME. cude, cude, code, var. guide, quado (> E. quid, q. v.), < AS. cūda, cūda, cūda (def. 1), also in hēit cūda (also hēit cūda, cūda, cūda, gen. cūdus, cūdowes), mastie, lit. 'white cod'; usually derived, as 'that which is chewed,' from cūda, E. chew; but the orig. form of the word is cūda (whence the mod. form quid, q. v.), and neither cūda nor cūda can be formed from cūda, Teut.  $\sqrt{*ku, *kū, by any regular process. The word agrees more nearly (though the connection is doubtful) with AS. cūth = OHG. gūthi = Icel. kúthr = Goth. kúthus, stomach, belly, womb (in AS. only in last sense), prob. = L. ventor = Gr. yēthē = Skt. jathara, belly: see ventor, ventral, etc., gastric, etc.] 1. A portion of food voluntarily forced into the mouth from the first stomach by a ruminating animal, and leisurely chewed a second time. See ruminant, rumination.—2. A quid.—To chew the cod. See chew.$*

codbear (kud' bār), n. [After Dr. Cuthbert Gordon, who first brought it into notice.] 1. A purple or violet powder, used in dyeing violet, purple, and crimson, prepared from various species of lichens, especially from Lecanora tartarea, which grows on rocks in northern Europe. It is partially soluble in boiling water, and is red with acids and violet-blue with alkalis. It is prepared nearly in the same way as archil, and is applied to silks and woolsens, having no affinity for cotton. The color obtained from codbear is somewhat fugitive, and it is used chiefly to give strength and brilliancy to blues dyed with indigo.

Codbear-plant (Lecanora tartarea).

2. The plant Lecanora tartarea. Also called codweed.

cudden (kud'n), n. [< E. cuddy.] A clown; a dolt; an idiot.

The slaving cudden, propp'd upon his staff,
Blood ready gaping with a grinning laugh.
Drayton, Cyn. and Iph., l. 178.

cudden (kud'n), n. [< E. cuddy, also written cuddin, and equiv. to cudde = cuddy and cuth: see cuddy.] A local English name of the coalfish.

cuddle, n. See cuddy.
cudding (kud'ing), n. [< E. cudden.] The char (a fish). [< Scotch.]

cuddle (kud'l), v.; pret. and pp. cuddled, ppr. cuddling. [Origin uncertain; perhaps freq. of ME. **cudden* for cuthen (only once, in pret. kuthed), otherwise kethen, embrace (rare in this form and sense), another spelling or a secondary form of reg. ME. cuthen, kuthen, later kithen (pret. cudde, kiddle, keilde), make known, manifest (hence, be familiar), < cuth, couth, known: see couth and kith. Cf. E. dial. cuttle, talk, cutter, fondle, etc., Sc. cuttle, wheedle (see cuttle, cutler, cuttle); OD. kudden, come together, flock together, D. kudde, a flock. I. trans. To hug; fondle; embrace so as to keep warm.

He'll mak' mickle o' you, and dandle and cuddle you like ane of his ain dawties. Tennant, Cardinal Beaton, p. 28.

II. Intrans. 1. To join in a hug; embrace. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.]—2. To lie close or snug; nestle.

She [a partridge] cuddles low behind the brake:
Nor would she stay: nor dares she fly.

cuddle-me-to-you (kud'l-mē-tō'ū), n. Same as call-me-to-you.

cuddy (kud'l), n.; pl. cuddies (-ies). [*E. dial. and Sc. (Sc. also cudde, comp. cuddy-ass), prob. a particular use of Cuddy, a proper name, familiar abbr. of Cuthbert. Cf. neidy and jack.]*

1. An ass; a donkey.

Just simple Cuddy an' her foal!
Duff, Poems, p. 26. (Jamieson.)

While studying the pons asinorum in Euclid, he suffered every cuddy upon the common to trespass upon a large field belonging to the Laird.

Scott, Heart of Mid-Lothian, lx.

2. A stupid or silly fellow; a clown.

It costs more tricks and troubles by half,
Than it takes to exhibit a six-legged calf
To a boothful of country cuddies.
Hood, Miss Kilmansegg.

3. A lever mounted on a tripod for lifting stones, leveling up railroad-ties, etc.; a lever-

cuddy (kud'l), n.; pl. cuddies (-ies). [Origin obscure. Cf. cubby.] 1. Naut., a room or cabin abaft and under the poop-deck, in which the officers and cabin-passengers take their meals; also, a sort of cabin or cook-room in lighters, barges, etc.; in small boats, a locker. [< Obscure.]

He threw himself in at the door of the cuddy.
Winthrop, Hist. New England, II. 60.

Hence—2. Any small cupboard or storehouse for odds and ends.

cuddy (kud'l), n.; pl. cuddies (-ies). [*E. dial. (North.) and Sc. cudde; also written cudden, cuddin, cuth, and couth, the coalfish; cf. (Icel. cudaiq, cudainn, Ir. cudainn, a small fish, supposed to be the young of the coalfish.) A name of the coalfish.*

cuddy (kud'l), n.; pl. cuddies (-ies). [*E. dial., prob., like cuddy, a familiar use of the homely proper name Cuddy, abbr. of Cuthbert. (Y. E. dial. (Devon.) cuddian, a wren.) The gallinule, Gallinula chloropus. Montagu. [Local, British.]*

cuddy-legs (kud'l-legz), n. A local English name of a large herring.

cudgel (kuj'el), n. [*< ME. kuggel, of Celtic origin; W. cogyl, a cudgel, club; orig. perhaps 'distaff'; cf. W. cogail, a truncheon, distaff, = Gael. cuaille, a club, cudgel, bludgeon, cuigéal, a distaff, = Ir. cuail, a pole, stake, staff, cuigéal, a distaff; cf. Ir. cuach, a bottom of yarn, cuchog, a skein of thread. So E. distaff is named from the bunch of flax on the end.] A short thick stick used as a weapon; a club; specifically, a staff used in cudgel-play.*

Mid to holle rode steane, that him is lothest kuggel, leie on the deoult dogge. [With the staff of the holy road, which is to him the hatefulest cudgel, lay on the devil dog.]
Arnold, Riddle, p. 202.

Some have been beaten till they know
What wold a cudgel's o' by the blow.

To cross the cudgels. See cross.—To take up the cudgels, to engage in a contest or controversy (in self-defense or in behalf of another); accept the gage.

The girl had been reading the "Life of Carlyle," and she took up the cudgels for the old curmudgeon, as King called him.

cudgel (kuj'el), v. t.; pret. and pp. cudgelled, ppr. cudgeling or cudgelling. [< cudgel, n.] To strike with a cudgel or club; beat, in general.

If he were here, I would cudgel him like a dog.
Shak., 1 Hen. IV., III. 3.

At length in a rage the forerger grew,
And cudgell'd bold Robin so sore.
Robin Hood and the Ranger (Child's Ballads, V. 200).

To cudgel one's brains. See brain.

cudgeler, cudgeller (kuj'el-er), n. One who strikes with a cudgel.

They were often lyable to a night-walking cudgeler.
Milton, Apology for Smectymnus.

cudgelling, cudgelling (kuj'el-ing), n. [*Verbal n. of *cudgel, v.] A beating with a cudgel.

He must fight singly to-morrow with Hector; and is so prophetically proud of an heroic cudgelling that he raves in saying nothing. Shak., T. and C., III. 3.

cudgel-play (kuj'el-plā), n. 1. A contest with cudgels.

Near the dying of the day
There will be a cudgel-play.
Where a cockcomb will be broke,
Kre a good word can be spoke.
Witt's Recreations, 1654. (Nares.)

2. The science or art of combat with cudgels. It includes the use of the quarter-staff, back-sword, shillalah, single-stick, and other similar weapons. See these words.

cudgel-proof (kuj'el-prōf), a. Able to resist the blow of a cudgel; insensible to beating or not to be hurt by it.

His doublet was of sturdy buff,
And though not sword, yet cudgel proof.

cudweed (kud'wēd), n. 1. The popular name of the common species of Gnaphalium. Also called chafweed.

There is a plant, which our herbalists call "herbam im plant," or wicked cudweed, whose younger branches still yield flowers to overtop the elder.
Sp. Hall, Remains, Profaneness, II. 14.

2. Same as codbear, 2.—Childing cudweed, Gnaphalium Germanicum: so called from its throwing out a circle of shoots at the base, likened to a family of children.—Golden cudweed, of Jamaica, the Pterocaulon nigrum, a white tomentose herb resembling plants of the genus Gnaphalium. (See also sea-cudweed.)

cue (kū), n. [Formerly also kue, and (in def. 3) qu; also often as F. queuo; < F. queuo, < OF. coue, cue = Fr. coe = Sp. coa, now cola = Pg. cauda, coda = It. coda, C. loda, cauda, a tail: see cauda, caudal. Cf. coward, from the same ult. source.] 1. The tail; something hanging down like a tail, as the long curl of a wig or a long roll or plait of hair. In this sense also queuo. See pigtail.

Each of those cues or locks is somewhat thicker than common whip-cord, and they look like a parcel of small strings hanging down from the crown of their heads.
Cook, Voyages, IV. III. 4.

2. A number of persons ranged in a line, awaiting their turn to be served, as at a bank or a ticket-office. In this sense also queuo.—3. (a) Theat., words which when spoken at the end of a speech in the course of a play are the signal for an answering speech, or for the entrance of another actor, etc.

You speak all your part at once, cues and all.—Pyramus, enter; your cue is past; it is "never tire."
Shak., M. N. D., III. 1.

When my cue comes, call me, and I will answer.
Shak., M. N. D., IV. 1.

(b) In music, a fragment of some other part printed in small notes, at the end of a long rest or silence occurring in the part of a voice or an instrument, to assist the singer or player in beginning promptly and correctly. Hence—4. A hint; an intimation; a guiding suggestion.

"The Whig papers are very subdued," continued Mr. Righy. "Ah! they have not the cue yet," said Lord Eardale.

Such is the cue to which all Rome responds.
Browning, Ring and Book, II. 519.

5. The part which one is to play; a course of action prescribed, or made necessary by circumstances.

Were it my cue to fight, I should have known it Without a prompter. Shak., Othello, I. 2.

The flexible conclave, finding they had mistaken their cue, promptly answered in the negative. Prescott.

6. Humor; turn or temper of mind.

When they work one to a proper cue,
What they forbid one takes delight to do. Orville.

Was ever before such a grinding out of figs and walnuts, where nobody was in the cue to dance?
Hawthorne, Seven Gables, xix.

My uncle [was] in thoroughly good cue.
Dickens, Pickwick, xlix.

7. A straight tapering rod tipped with a small soft pad, used to strike the balls in billiards, bagatelle, and similar games.—8. A support for a lance; a lance-rest.

cue (kū), v. t. [< cue, n.] To tie into a cue or tail.

They separate it into small locks which they would or cue round with the rind of a slender plant, . . . and as the hair grows the wooling is continued.

cue (kū), n. [Formerly also qu; < ME. cue, cu, or simply q, standing for l. quadrans, a farthing, though the cue seems to have been used for half a farthing. See extract from Minshew.] 1. The name of the letter Q, q.—2. (a) A farthing; a half-farthing.

A cue, i. e. [a.] half a farthing, so called because they set down in the Buttling or Butterlie books in Oxford and Cambridge the letter q for half a farthing, and in Oxford when they make that cue or q a farthing, they say, 'Cap. my q, and make it a farthing, thus.' But in Cambridge they use this letter, a little a, . . . for a farthing. Minshew, 1617.

(b) A farthing's worth; the quantity bought with a farthing, as a small quantity of bread or beer.

With rumps and kidneys, and cues of single beer.
Beau, and Fl., Wit at several Weapons, II. 2.

Cry at the buttry-hatch, Ho, Lancelot, a cue of bread, and a cue of beer! Middleton, The Black Book.

cue-ball (kū'bāl), n. In billiards and similar games, the ball struck by the cue, as distinguished from the other balls on the table.

cue-ball (kū'bāl), a. A corruption of skew-bald. [Prov. Eng.]

A gentleman on a cue-ball horse.

cue-rack (kū'rak), n. A rack or stand for holding billiard-cues.

cuerda (kwer'dā), n. [Sp., a measure of length (see def.), lit. a cord, = E. cord: see cord.] 1. The name of several different Spanish units of length. The cuerda of Castile was variously 84 and 84 varas, or 22 feet 7.3 inches and 22 feet 3.7 inches. The cuerda of Valencia was equal to 123 English feet. The cuerda of Buenos Ayres is 161 varas of Castile, or 140 yards 1 inch, English measure.

2. In the province of La Mancha in Spain, a measure of land, one half of the seed-ground for a fanega of corn.

cuerpo (kwer'pō), n. [Sp., < L. corpus, body: see corp.] The body.

Foot. Cuerpo! what's that?
Tip. Light skipping hose and doublet,
The horse-boy's garb! E. Johnson, New Inn, II. 2.

In (or on) cuervo, without a cloak or upper garment, or without the formalities of a full dress, so that the shape of the body is exposed; hence, figuratively, naked or unprotected.

So they unmantled him of a new Flush Cloak, and my Secretary was content to go home quietly, and in cuervo.
Howells, Letters, I, 1. 17.

cuff<sup>1</sup> (kuf), v. [Appar. < Sw. kuffa, thrust, push, said to be freq. of kufsa, subdue, suppress, cow: see cow.] I. trans. 1. To strike with or as with the open hand.

Cuff him soundly, but never draw thy sword.
Shak., T. N., III, 4.

2. To buffet in any way.

The budded peaks of the wood are how'd,
Caught and cuff'd by the gale. Tennyson, Maud, vi.

II. *intr. To fight; scuffle.

The peers cuff to make the rabble sport. Dryden.

cuff<sup>2</sup> (kuf), n. [< cuff<sup>1</sup>, r.] 1. A blow with the open hand; a box; any stroke with the hand or fist.

This mad-brain'd bridegroom took him such a cuff,
That down fell priest and book. Shak., T. of the N., III, 2.

2. A blow or stroke from or with anything.
With wounding cuff of cannon a fiery ball.

Mir. for Maps, p. 384.

cuff<sup>3</sup> (kuf), n. [Early mod. E. cuffe, < ME. cuffe, coffe, a glove or mitten, prob. < AS. cuffa, found once in sense of 'hood' or 'cap,' < ML. cofia, cofea, cuffa, cupha, > also It. cuffia = F. cuffit, etc., a cap, coif: see coif.] 1. A glove; a mitten.

He caste on his clothes i-clouted and i-hole,
His cokers and his cuffs for colde of his nayles.
Piers Plowman (A), vii, 56.

Prompt. Parv., p. 106.

2. (a) A distinct terminal part of a sleeve at the wrist, intended for embellishment. The cuff was made originally by turning back the sleeve itself and showing either the same material as that of the sleeve or a different material used as a lining. In the fifteenth century a prominent part of the dress was the large cuff, which could be turned down so as to cover the hand to the finger-tips, and when turned back reached nearly to the elbow. In modern times the coat-sleeve has been sometimes made with a cuff which can be turned down over the hand, though not intended to be so used, and sometimes with a semblance of a cuff, indicated by braid or buttons, or by a facing of velvet or other material, or merely by a line or lines of stitching around the sleeve. (b) A band of linen, lace, or the like, taking the place of, and covering a part of the sleeve in the same manner as, the turned-up cuff. In the seventeenth century such cuffs, worn by ladies, were often extremely rich, of expensive lace, and reached nearly to the elbow. Plain linen cuffs were also worn about 1640, and were especially affected by the Puritans in England. When the plain linen wristband worn attached to the shirt by men first came into use, in the early part of the nineteenth century, it was commonly turned back over the sleeve, and was a true cuff. (c) In recent times, a separate band of linen or other material worn about the wrist and appearing below the end of the sleeve. As worn by men, it is buttoned to the wristband of the shirt.—3. That part of a long glove which covers the wrist and forearm, especially when stiff and exhibiting a cylindrical or conical form.

ly called cuirassiers in the French and other European armies. The cuirass seems to have been first adopted in England in the reign of Charles I, when the light cavalry were armed with buff coats, having the breast and back covered with steel plates. Subsequently this piece of armor fell into disuse, and was resumed by the English only after the battle of Waterloo, where the charges of the French cuirassiers were very effective.

2. Any similar covering, as the protective armor of a ship; specifically, in soöl, some hard shell or other covering forming an indurated defensive shield, as the carapace of a beetle or an armadillo, the bony plates of a mailed fish, etc.—Double cuirass, the usual form of cuirass of the first half of the fifteenth century, consisting of a plastron and a pander moving freely one over the other.

cuirassé (kwē-rās't or kwē-rās'), a. [< cuirass + -ed.] Furnished with a cuirass or other protective covering: as, cuirassé ships; cuirassé fishes.

The cuirassé sentry walked his sleepless round.

cuirassier (kwē-rās'ēr'), n. [< F. cuirassier, < cuirasse, cuirass.] A mounted soldier armed with the cuirass. The cavalry of the time of the English civil wars was commonly so armed. The word was introduced in the seventeenth century to replace platiere (which see). In modern European armies there are generally one or two regiments of cuirassiers. See cuirass.

Cuirassiers, all in steel for standing fight.

Milton, P. R., III, 528.

I conducted him with a guard of honour, consisting of a squadron of the first Cuirassier regiment, to Bellevue.
Quoted in Lives of Bismarck, I, 561.

cuirassine, n. [OF., dim. of cuirasse, cuirass.] In armor, an additional thickness put upon the breastpiece of a corselet, or a plate of steel secured to the brigandine to give additional defense. Compare mammellière, 2, plastron, placate, pectorale.

cuir-bouilli, cuir-bouilly (kwē-bō'ly), n. [F. cuir bouilli (> ME. curboully, quirboully, etc.), lit. boiled leather: see cuirass and boil.] Leather prepared by boiling and pressing, so that it becomes extremely hard and capable of preserving permanently the shape and surface-decoration given it, and can afford considerable resistance to sword-cuts and other violence. It has been much used from the middle ages to the present day for armor, crests, helmets, and ornamental utensils of many kinds. For elaborate work it is now prepared by boiling and then pressed in molds; for common work it is merely soaked in hot water before pressing.

cuir-tan (kwē'r'tan), n. White twilled cloth made in Scotland from fine wool, for undergarments and hose. Planché.

cuishes (kwish'ez), n. pl. [Also cuisses; < ME. cuishens (for **cuissches*) (Wright), cuishes (Halliwell), < OF. cuissauz (Cotgrave), pl. of cuissel (= It. coziale), also cuissere and cuissart (> mod. F. cuissard), also cuissote, pl., armor for the thighs (mod. F. cuissot, a haunch of venison) (= Sp. quijote, formerly quiroto (whence the name of the famous Don Quixote: see quis-otic) = Pg. coavote, armor for the thighs; ML. cuissellus, cuissorinus, cuissetus, after the OF. forms), < cuisse, F. cuisse = Pr. coissa, cuissa = Pg. coza = It. cozia (ML. cuissia), the thigh, < L. coza, the hip: see coza.] Armor for the thighs; specifically, plate-armor worn over the chausses of mail or other material, whether in a single forging or in plates lapping over one another. In the fully developed plate-armor of the fifteenth century the cuishes became barrels of steel, each in two parts, divided vertically, hinged on one side, and fastening on the other with hooks, turn-buckles, or the like. See second cut under armor.

I saw young Harry, with his beaver on,
His cuisses on his thighs, gallantly arm'd,
Rise from the ground like feather'd Mercury.

Shak., 1 Hen. IV., iv, 1.

And how came the cuishes to be worse tempered than the rest of his armour, which was all wrought by Vulcan and his journeyman? Dryden, Epic Poet.

All his greaves and cuisses dash'd with drops
Of onset. Tennyson, Morte d'Arthur.

Culicidae (kū-lis-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Culex (Oulix) + -idae.] A family of nemocerous dipterous insects, containing the gnats, midges, mosquitoes, etc. They have a long slender proboscis of seven pieces, filiform or plumose antennae, contiguous eyes without ocelli, and wings with few cells. The eggs are laid on substances in the water, in which the larvae live. The latter are provided with respiratory organs at the hinder end of the body, and consequently swim head downward. There are about 150 species of the family. See cuts under gnat, midge, and mosquito.

culiciform (kū-lis-i-fōrm), a. [NL. culiciformis, < L. culex (culico), a gnat or flea, + forma, shape.] Resembling a gnat; having the characters of the Culicidae or Culiciformes.

Culiciformes (kū-lis-i-fōrmēs), n. pl. [NL., pl. of culiciformis; see culiciform.] A group of gnat-like insects, including such genera as Chironomus and Corsetra, equivalent to a family Chironomidae, coming next to the Culicidae.

culicifuge (kū-lis-i-fūj), n. [NL. culex (culico), a gnat, + fugare, drive away.] An antidote against gnats and mosquitoes. Also culexifuge.

Culicivora (kū-lis-i-vō-rā), n. [NL. (Swainson, 1827), < L. culex (culico), a gnat, + vorare, eat, devour; see voracious.] 1. A genus of South American clamatorial flycatchers, of the family Tyrannidae. The type is C. stemura, a Brazilian species.—2. A genus of American oscine passerine birds; the gnatcatchers: a synonym of Polioptila. Swainson, 1837.

Cullawian bark. See bark 2.

culinary (kū'lī-nē-ri), adv. In the manner of a kitchen or of cookery; in connection with, or in relation to, a kitchen or cookery.

Sponser.

cully (kū'lī), n.; pl. cullies (-is). [Old slang, an abbr. of cullion, 3, with sense modified appar. by association with gull. According to Leland, of gipsy origin—"Sp. Gypsy chulai, a man, Turk. Gypsy khalai, a gentleman." A fellow; a "goat"; especially, a verdant fellow who is easily deceived, tricked, or imposed on, as by a sharper, jilt, or strumpet; a mean dupe. [Slang.]

Thus, when by rooks a lord is pilled, Some cully often wins a bet By venturing on the cheating side.

Swift, South Sea Project.

I have learned that this fine lady does not live far from Covent Garden, and that I am not the first cully whom she has passed upon for a countess.

Addison.

cully (kū'lī), v. t.; pret. and pp. cullied, ppr. culling. [C. cully, n.] To deceive; trick; cheat, or impose upon; jilt; gull. [Slang.]

Tricks to cully tools.

Poinsett, Divine Attributes, Goodness.

cullism (kū'lī-izm), n. [C. cully + -ism.] The state of being a cully. [Slang.]

Without dwelling upon these less frequent instances of eminent cullism, what is there so common as to hear a fellow curse his fate that he cannot get rid of a passion to a jilt!

Addison, Spectator, No. 485.

cullyock (kū'lī-ok), n. [Origin obscure.] A bivalve mollusk, Tapes pullastra, better known as pullet. Also culleock, cullock. [Shetland.]

culm (kūlm), n. [Also dial. coom; appar. < ME. culme, culm, soot, smoke, > culmy, coomy.] 1. Coal-dust; slack; refuse of coal. [Pennsylvania.]—2. In mining, a soft or slaty and inferior kind of anthracite, especially that occurring in Devonshire, England.—3. The name given by some geologists to a series of rocks which occupy the position of the Carboniferous limestone (see carboniferous), but which, instead of being developed in the form of massive calcareous beds, are made up of slates, sandstones, and conglomerates, and occasional beds of coal, usually of inferior quality.

The fauna of the culm is in general much less abundant than that usually found in the Carboniferous limestone proper; its flora is, however, in some regions exceptionally rich. The rocks designated as culm occur extensively along the borders of Russia, Poland, and Austria; and similar ones, in the same geological position, are found developed on a considerable scale in Scotland, and also in Ireland. In the last-named country they are locally known as calp. See calp.

culm (kūlm), n. [L. culmus, a stalk; cf. calamus, a stalk (see calamus) = E. hawlum, q. v.] In bot., the jointed and usually hollow stem of grasses. It is in most cases herbaceous, but in woody in the bamboo and some other stout species. The term is also sometimes applied to the solid jointless stems of sedges.

culm-bar (kūlm'bār), n. A peculiar bar used in grates designed for burning culm or slack coal.

culmen (kūl'men), n. [L.: see culminate.] 1. Top; summit.

At the culmen or top was a chapel.

Sir T. Herbert, Travels, p. 227.

2. [NL.] Specifically, in ornith., the median lengthwise ridge of the upper mandible. See first cut under bill.

The culmen is to the upper mandible what the ridge is to the roof of a house; it is the upper profile of the bill—the highest middle lengthwise line of the bill. . . . In a great many birds, especially those with depressed bill, as all the ducks, there is really no culmen; but then the median lengthwise line of the surface of the upper mandible takes the place and name of culmen.

Coues, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 104.

3. [NL.] In anat., the upper and anterior portion of the monticulus of the vermis superior of the cerebellum. Also called oculomen.

culmicolous (kul-mik'ō-lus), a. [L. culmus, a stalk, culm (see culm), + colore, inhabit.] Growing upon culms of grasses: said of some fungi.

culminal (kul'mi-nāl), a. [L. culmen (culmin) + -al.] Of or pertaining to the culmen or summit; uppermost; apical.

culminant (kul'mi-nant), a. [ML. culminans (-t), ppr. of culminare: see culminate, v.] Culminating; reaching the highest point.

I did spy

Sun, moon, and stars, by th' painter's art appear,

At once all culminant in one hemisphere.

A. Brome, To his Mistress.

culminate (kul'mi-nāt), v. i.; pret. and pp. culminated, ppr. culminating. [ML. culminatus, pp. of culminare (> It. culminare = Sp. Pg. culminar = F. culminer, > D. kulmineren = G. kulmineren = Dan. kulminere), < L. culmen (culmina) (> It. culmine = Sp. culmen = Pg. culme), the highest point, older form culmen, > ult. E. culmen, q. v.] 1. To come to or be on the meridian; be in the highest point of altitude, as a star, or, according to the usage of astronomers, reach either the highest or the lowest altitude.

As when his beams at noon
Culminate from the equator.

Milton, P. L., III. 617.

The regal star, then culminating, was the sun.

Dryden, Vind. of Duke of Guise.

The star of Guise, brilliant with the conquest of Calais, now culminated to the zenith.

Motley, Dutch Republic, I. 180.

2. To reach the highest point, apex, or summit, literally or figuratively.

The mountains forming this cape culminate in a grand conical peak.

B. Taylor, Lands of the Sarcophagi, p. 180.

Both records [the biblical and the scientific] give us a grand procession of dynasties of life, beginning from the lower forms and culminating in man.

Darwin, Nature and the Bible, p. 119.

culminate (kul'mi-nāt), a. [ML. culminatus, pp.: see the verb.] Growing upward, as distinguished from a lateral growth: applied to the growth of corals. Dana.

culminating (kul'mi-nā-ting), p. a. [Ppr. of culminate, v.] 1. Being at or crossing the meridian; being at its highest elevation, as a planet.—2. Being at its highest point, as of rank, power, magnitude, numbers, or quality.

This Madonna, with the sculpture round her, represents the culminating power of Gothic art in the thirteenth century.

Ruskin.

Beauty is, even in the beautiful, occasional—or, as one has said, culminating and perfect only a single moment, before which it is unripe, and after which it is on the wane.

Emerson, Domestic Life.

culmination (kul'mi-nā'shon), n. [= F. culmination (> D. kulminatie = G. culmination = Dan. kulmination) = Sp. culminacion = Pg. culminação = It. culminazione, < *ML. *culminatio* (n.), < culminare, pp. culminatus: see culminate, v.] 1. The position of a heavenly body when it is on the meridian; the attainment by a star of its highest or lowest altitude on any day.—2. The highest point or summit; the top; the act or fact of reaching the highest point: used especially in figurative senses.

We . . . wonder how that which in its putting forth was a flower should in its growth and culmination become a thistle.

Farndon, Sermons, p. 428.

Lower or upper culmination, the attainment by a star of its lowest or highest altitude on any day.

culminicorn (kul'mi-n'kōrn), n. [L. culmen (culmin), top, + cornu = E. horn.] (Coues, 1866.) In ornith., the superior one of the horny pieces into which the sheath of the bill of some birds, as albatrosses, is divided; the piece which increases the culmen of the bill.

The culminicorn is transversely broad and rounded.

Coues, Proc. Phila. Acad., 1866, p. 175.

culmy (kul'mi), a. and n. Same as colmy. culot (kū'lot), n. [F., < cul, < L. culus, posterior, bottom.] 1. An iron cup inserted in the concultism (kul'tizm), n. [Cf. cult + -ism.] The pedantic style of composition affected by the cultists.

The cultism of Góngora, the artifice of which lies solely in the choice and arrangement of words.

Encyc. Brit., XXII. 360.

cultist (kul'tist), n. [Cf. cult + -ist; equiv. to Sp. cultero, cultorano, an affected purist.] One of a school of Spanish poets who imitated the pedantic affectation and labored elegance of Góngora y Argote, a Spanish writer (1561-1627).

A century earlier the school of the cultists had established a dominion, ephemeral, as it soon appeared, but absolute while it lasted.

Lowell, Study Windows, p. 391.

cultivable (kul'ti-vā-bl), a. [= F. cultivable = Sp. cultivable = Pg. cultivavel = It. coltivabile, < *ML. as if *cultivabilis*, < cultivare, till: see cultivate.] Capable of being tilled or cultivated; capable of improvement or refinement.

The soils of cultivable lands hold in a greater or less proportion all that is essential to the growth of plants.

J. R. Nichols, Firsides Science, p. 151.

The descendant of a cultivated race has an enhanced aptitude for the reception of cultivation; he is more cultivable.

Whitney, Encyc. Brit., XVIII. 768.

cultivable (kul'ti-vā-tā-bl), a. [Cultivate + -able.] Cultivable.

Large tracts of rich cultivable soil.

British and Foreign Rev., No. II., p. 285.

cultivate (kul'ti-vāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. cultivated, ppr. cultivating. [ML. cultuare, pp. of cultuare (> It. cultuare, cultuare = Sp. Pg. cultivar = OF. cultuer, cultuer, cultuer, cultuer, etc., F. cultiver), till, work, as land, < cultivus, tilled, under tillage, < L. cultus, pp. of colere, till: see cult.] 1. To till; prepare for crops; manure, plow, dress, sow, and reap; manage and improve in husbandry: as, to cultivate land; to cultivate a farm.

I have had a large, a fair, and a pleasant field; so fertile that, without my cultivating, it has given me two harvests in a summer.

Dryden, To Sir R. Howard.

2. To raise or produce by tillage: as, to cultivate corn or grass.—3. To use a cultivator upon; run a cultivator through: as, to cultivate a field of standing corn. See cultivator (n.). [U. S.]

—4. To improve and strengthen by labor or study; promote the development or increase of; cherish; foster: as, to cultivate talents; to cultivate a taste for poetry.

As your commissioners our poets go,

To cultivate the virtue which you sow.

Dryden, University of Oxford, Prolog., I. 12.

5. To direct special attention to; devote study, labor, or care to; study to understand, derive advantage from, etc.: as, to cultivate literature; to cultivate an acquaintance.

The ancient philosophers did not neglect natural science, but they did not cultivate it for the purpose of increasing the power . . . of man. Macaulay, Lord Bacon.

He who cultivates only one precept of the Gospel, to the exclusion of the rest, in reality attends to no part at all. J. H. Newman, Parochial Sermons, 1. 300.

The study of History is . . . as Coleridge said of Poetry, its own great reward, a thing to be loved and cultivated for its own sake.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 24.

6. To improve; meliorate; correct; civilize.

To cultivate the wild licentious savage.

Addison, Cato, 1. 4.

cultivated (kul'ti-vā-ted), p. a. Produced by or subjected to cultivation; specifically, cultured; refined; educated.

My researches into cultivated plants show that certain species are ext<sup>d</sup> act, or becoming extinct, since the historical epoch.

De Candolle, Orig. of Cultivated Plants (trans.), p. 459.

In proportion as there are more thoroughly cultivated persons in a community will the finer uses of prosperity be taught and the vulgar uses of it become disreputable.

Lowell, Oration, Harvard, Nov. 8, 1884.

cultivating (kul'ti-vā-ting), p. a. Engaged in the processes of cultivation; agricultural. [Rare.]

The Russian Village Communities were seen to be the Indian Village Communities, if anything in a more archaic condition than the eastern cultivating group.

Morse, Early Law and Custom, p. 240.

cultivation (kul-ti-vā-shŏn), n. [= F. cultivation, OF. cultivacion, cultivacion, cultivacion, etc., = Sp. cultivacion = Pg. cultivacão = It. coltivazione, < *ML. *cultivatio(n)-*, < cultivare, cultivate: see cultivate.] 1. The act or practice of tilling land and preparing it for crops; the agricultural management of land; husbandry in general.

Such is the nature of Spain; wild and stern the moment it escapes from cultivation; the desert and the garden are ever side by side.

Iving, Alhambra, p. 274.

2. Land in a cultivated state; tilled land with its crops. [Rare.]

It is curious to observe how defined the line is between the rich green cultivation and the barren yellow desert.

K. Sartorius, in the Sudan, p. 12.

3. The act or process of producing by tillage: as, the cultivation of corn or grass.—4. The use of a cultivator upon growing crops.—5. The process of developing; promotion of growth or strength, physical or mental: as, the cultivation of the oyster; the cultivation of organic germs, or of animal virus; the cultivation of the mind, or of virtue, piety, etc.

No capital is better provided [than Madrid] with sundry of the higher means to cultivation, as its Royal Armory, its Archaeological Museum, and its glorious Picture Gallery . . . remind one.

Lathrop, Spanish Vistas, p. 25.

6. The state of being cultivated; specifically, a state of moral or mental advancement; culture; refinement; the union of learning and taste.

You cannot have people of cultivation, of pure character, . . . professing to be in communication with the spirit world and keeping up constant intercourse with it, without its gradually reacting on the whole conception of that other life.

O. W. Holmes, The Professor, 1.

Fractional cultivation. See the extract.

Fractional cultivation consists in the attempt to isolate by successive cultivations the different organisms that have been growing previously in the same culture.

H. Klein, Micro-Organisms and Disease, p. 24.

—Syn. 5. Training, Discipline, Education, etc. See instruction.—6 and 7. Refinement, etc. See culture.

cultivator (kul'ti-vā-tŏr), n. [= F. cultivateur, OF. cultivoor, cultivoor, etc., = Sp. Pg. cultivador = It. coltivatore, < *ML. as if *cultivator*, < cultivare, cultivate: see cultivate.] One who or that which cultivates. (a) One who tills or prepares land for crops, or carries on the operations of husbandry in general; a farmer; a husbandman; an agriculturist. (b) A producer by cultivation; a grower of any kind of products: as, a cultivator of oysters.

It has been lately complained of, by some cultivators of clover-grass, that from a great quantity of the seed not any grass springs up.

Boyle.

(c) An agricultural implement used to loosen the earth and uproot the weeds about growing crops which are planted in rows or hills. It consists of points or shares attached to a framework, usually adjustable in width, and having draft-wheels which govern the depth to which the ground is broken up. It is drawn between the rows of plants by a horse. There are also light forms which are operated by hand. (d) One who devotes special attention, care, or study to some person or pursuit.

The most successful cultivators of physical science.

Buckle, Civilization, 1. 1.

cultivate, cultivated (kul'trēt, -tēd), a. [L. cultivate, knife-shaped, < cultus, a knife: see cultus, cultus.] Sharp-edged and pointed; culter-shaped, or shaped like a pruning-knife, as a body that is thick on one edge and acute on the other: as, a cultivate leaf; the beak of a bird is convex and cultivate.

cultiform (kul'tri-fŏrm), a. [= F. cultriforme, < L. culter, a knife, + forma, shape.] Cultrate: specifically applied, in zool., to a tapering or elongate part or organ when it is bounded by three sides meeting in angles, one of the sides being shorter than the other two, so that the section everywhere is an acute-angled triangle.

cultirostral (kul'tri-ros'tral), a. [NL. cultrirostris, < L. culter, a knife, + rostrum, a beak, + -al.] 1. Having a cultrate bill; having a bill shaped somewhat like the culter of a plow, or adapted for cutting like a knife: as, cultirostral oscine birds.—2. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Cultrirostres.

Also, erroneously, cultirostral.

Cultrirostres (kul'tri-ros'trēs), n. pl. [NL. pl. of cultrirostris: see cultirostral.] 1. In Cuvier's system of classification, a family of Grallæ, including the cranes, courlans, herons, storks, and sundry other large waders, as distinguished from the Pressirostres or plover group, and the Longirostres or snipe group. [Not in use.]—2. In some later systems, a group of laminiplan-tar oscine passerine birds, as the crows and corvine birds generally.

Also, erroneously, Cultrirostres.

cultrivorous (kul'triv'ŏ-rus), a. [= Sp. cultrivora, < L. culter, a knife, + vorare, swallow, devour.] Swallowing or seeming to swallow knives. Dunlopian. [Rare.]

culturable (kul'tŭr-ə-bl), a. [C. culture + -able.] 1. Adapted to culture; cultivable: as, a culturable area.

Recent explorers affirm that there is no reason why these canals should not be again filled from those rivers, when the intervening country . . . would become culturable.

Encyc. Brit., XVI. 48.

2. Capable of becoming cultured or refined.

[Rare in both uses.] cultural (kul'tŭr-əl), a. [= F. cultural; < culture + -al.] Pertaining to culture; specifically, pertaining to mental culture or discipline; educational; promoting refinement or education.

In every variety of cultural condition.

Whitney, Life and Growth of Lang., p. 172.

In its cultural development, China stands wholly for itself.

Science, IV. 21.

culturate, v. t. [ML. cultivatus, pp. of culturare, cultivate, < L. cultura, cultivation, culture: see culture, n.] To cultivate. Capt. John Smith.

culture (kul'tŭr), n. [F. culture = Pr. Sp. Pg. cultura = It. cultura, cultura = G. Dan. kultur, < L. cultura, cultivation, tillage, care, culture, < cultus, pp. of colere, till, cultivate: see cult.] 1. The act of tilling and preparing the earth for crops; tillage; cultivation.

So that these three last were slower than the ordinary wheat of itself; and this culture did rather retard their advance.

Bacon, Sylva Sylvarum, § 402.

In vain our toil,

We ought to blame the culture, not the soil.

Pope, Essay on Man, iv. 14.

2. The act of promoting growth in animals or plants, but especially in the latter; specifically, the process of raising plants with a view to the production of improved varieties.

One might wear any passion out of a family by culture, as skillful gardeners hit a colour out of a tulip that hurts its beauty.

Tatler.

These bud variations . . . occur rarely under nature, but they are far from rare under culture.

Darwin, Origin of Species, 1.

Hence—3. In bacteriology: (a) The propagation of bacteria or other microscopic organisms by the introduction of the germs into suitably prepared fluids or other media, or of parasitic fungi upon living plants. Also called cultivation.

The only thing to be done now was to take advantage of what had previously been learned as to the attenuation of virus, and endeavor, through successive cultures, to progressively lessen the harmfulness of the rabid poison.

Sci. Amer. Supp., p. 8092.

(b) The product of such culture.

This bacillus [of typhoid fever] is difficult to stain in tissue, while pure cultures stain readily with the usual dyes.

Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, IV. 765.

4. The systematic improvement and refinement of the mind, especially of one's own.

[Not common before the nineteenth century, except with strong consciousness of the metaphor involved, though used in Latin by Cicero.]

Rather to the pomp and ostentation of their wit, than to the culture and profit of their minds.

Sir T. More, Works, p. 14.

The culture and manurance of minds in youth hath much a forcible (though unseen) operation as hardly any length of time or contention of labour can countervail it afterwards.

[English ed.], Works, III. 414.

O Lord, if thou suffer not thy servant, that we may pray before thee, and thou give us seed unto our heart, and culture to our understanding, that there may come fruit of it, how shall each man live that is corrupt, who beareth the place of a man?

2 Ecd. viii. 6.

Culture, the acquainting ourselves with the best that has been known and said in the world, and thus with the history of the human spirit.

M. Arnold, Literature and Dogma, Pref.

5. The result of mental cultivation, or the state of being cultivated; refinement or enlightenment; learning and taste; in a broad sense, civilization: as, a man of culture.

Culture or Civilization, taken in its wide ethnographic sense, is that complex whole which includes knowledge, belief, art, morals, law, custom, and any other capabilities and habits acquired by man as a member of society.

E. B. Tylor, Prim. Culture, 1. 1.

Culture in its widest sense is, I take it, thorough acquaintance with all the old and new results of intellectual activity in all departments of knowledge, so far as they conduce to welfare, to correct living, and to rational conduct.

W. K. Brooks, Life of Heredity, p. 271.

6. The training of the human body.

Amongst whom [the Spartans] also both in other things, and especially in the culture of their bodies, the nobility observed the most equality with the commons.

Hobbes, tr. of Thucydides, 1.

7. The pursuit of any art or science with a view to its improvement.

Our national resources are developed by an earnest culture of the arts of peace.

Bancroft, Hist. U. S., 1. 144.

8. Cultivated ground.

Proceeds the caravan

Through lively spreading cultures, pastures green,

And yellow tillages in opening woods.

Dyer, The Fleeces.

Gelatin culture, a growth of bacteria in a medium made of the consistence of jelly by means of gelatin.—Pure culture, in bacteriology, a growth of one kind of bacteria free from admixture of other varieties.—Solid culture, a culture of bacteria, etc., for which the medium is a solid at ordinary temperatures, usually gelatin or a preparation, such as agar-agar, made from algae.—Test-tube culture, a growth of bacteria in a test-tube.—Syn. 4-6. Assimilation, Cultivation, Culture. Each of these words may represent a process or the result of that process. Only refinement can, when unqualified, represent a process or result carried too far. Refinement is properly most negative, representing a freeing from what is gross, coarse, rude, and the like, or a bringing of one out of a similar condition in which he is supposed to have been at the start. Cultivation and culture represent the person or the better part of him as made to grow by long-continued and thorough work. Refinement and cultivation, as thus representing the more negative and the more positive aspects of the improvement of man, were much more common until within thirty years; since then culture has largely supplanted cultivation: this change, coming when great attention was concentrating about the subject of the development of all the departments of the nature of man, produced a great enlargement of the definition of culture, for a time the improvement and gratification of taste being magnified in undue proportion by some, and by others the mere acquisition of knowledge. The word is now applied to the improvement of the whole man, bodily, mentally, and spiritually, although bodily training is not prominent unless specially mentioned; the moral and the spiritual are jealously included. Culture may be used of the state of society as well as of the man; refinement and cultivation refer primarily to the state of the individual. As referring to either, culture in its broadest sense may be called the highest phase of civilization.

What do we mean by this fine word Culture, so much in vogue at present? What the Greeks naturally expressed by their paideia, the Romans by humanitas, we less happily try to express by the more artificial word Culture.

When applied to the human being, it means, I suppose, the "educating or drawing forth [of] all that is latent in a man," the training [of] all the energies and capacities of his being to the highest pitch, and directing them to their true ends.

culture (kul'tŭr), n. t.; pret. and pp. cultured pp. culturing. [C. culture, n. Cf. ML. cultura: see culture.] To cultivate: as, "cultured values." Shenstone, Elegies, xiv.

culture-bulb (kul'tŭr-bulb), n. A bulb-shaped culture-tube. Dolley, Bacteria Investigation p. 76.

culture-cell (kul'tŭr-sel), n. A small moist chamber for the microscopic observation of the culture of organic germs. It is usually made by fixing to a microscope slide a short glass cylinder; upon the latter a cover glass is placed, and the culture is laid in a drop of fluid on the lower surface of the cover-glass thus being available for microscopic examination at a time without disturbance. The culture is kept moist by water in the bottom of the cell.

cultured (kul'jŭrd), a. Having culture; refined.

The sense of beauty in nature, even among cultured people, is less often met with than other mental endowments.

Is. Taylor.

culture-fluid (kul'jŭr-flŭ'id), n. A fluid culture-medium.

Diluting the culture-fluid containing the various species to a very large extent with some sterile indifferent fluid.

B. Klein, Micro-Organisms and Diseases, p. 27.

cultureless (kul'jŭr-less), a. Without culture; uncultured.

culture-medium (kul'jŭr-mŕ'di-um), n. A substance, solid or fluid, in which bacteria or other microscopic organisms are cultivated. Among the frequently used culture-media are meat-broths, decoctions of dung, hay, and various vegetable substances, sugar-solution, orange-juice, boiled potatoes, gelatin, and gelatin-like preparations of algae, as agar agar.

culture-oven (kul'jŭr-uv'n), n. A small warmed chamber, kept at a uniform temperature, in which certain bacterial cultures are made. See culture, 3 (a).

culture-tube (kul'jŭr-tŭb), n. A tube in which bacteria, etc., are cultivated.

culturist (kul'jŭr-ist), n. [< culture + -ist.] 1. A cultivator; one who produces anything by cultivation.

The oyster industry is rapidly passing from the hands of the fisherman into those of the oyster culturist.

Encyc. Brit., XVIII. 108.

2. An advocate of the spread of culture or the education of the intellectual and esthetic powers; especially, one who regards culture in this sense rather than religion as the central element in civilization.

The Culturists . . . say that, since every man must have his ideal — material and selfish, or unselfish and spiritual — it lies mainly with culture to determine whether men shall rest content with grosser aims or raise their thoughts to the higher ideals.

cultus (kul'tus), n. [= G. cultus, etc., < L. cultus, care, culture, refinement: see cult.] 1. A system of religious belief and worship: same as cult, 2.

Buddhism, a missionary religion rather than an ancestral cultus, eagerly availed itself of the art of writing for the propagation of its doctrines.

Isaac Taylor, The Alphabet, II. 343.

Pure ethics is not now formulated and concretized into a cultus, a fraternity with assemblies and holy-days, with song and book, with brick and stone.

Emerson, N. A. Rev., CXXVI. 417.

2. The moral or esthetic state or condition of a particular time or place.

cultus-cod (kul'tus-kod), n. [Said to be < Chinoos cultus, worthless, of little value, + E. cod.] A chiroid fish, Ophiodon elongatus, of a lengthened form, with a long pointed head and many dorsal spines and rays. It reaches a length of from 3 to 4 feet and a weight of from 30 to 40 pounds. It abounds along the Pacific coast of the United States, and is one of the most important food-fishes of that region. Also called green-cod, and by many other names.

cultur, n. A Middle English form of color.
-culus, -cula, -culum [L. m., f., neut., respectively, of -culus, a compound dim. term., consisting of -c, an adj. term. used as dim. (see -ole), + -ul-us, a dim. term.: see -ule, -ol, -le, etc.] A diminutive termination in Latin words, some of which have entered English without change, as fasciculus, curriculum, operculum, operculum, tenaculum, vinculum, etc., but which have usually taken the form -culus, as in animalculus, resticulus, etc., or more frequently -ole, as in articulo, auriculo, particula, conventicula, versicula, ventricula, etc. See -ule, -ole.

culver (kul'vŕr), n. [< ME. culver, culver, culvere, culŕre, culŕre, < AS. culŕre, culŕre, a dove, prob. a corruption of L. columba, a dove: see Columba.] 1. A dove; a pigeon. [Now only local.]

Crye to Crist that he wolde his culvers sende,
The while he is the holy gost that out of hevene descended.

Piers Plowman (7), xviii. 344.

Lyke as the Culver, on the bared bough,
Sits mourning for the absence of her mate.

Spenser, Sonnets, lxxxviii.

culver (kul'vŕr), n. [Short for culverin, perhaps with reference to culver, a dove, as guns were sometimes called by the names of birds; e. g., falcon and saker.] Same as culverin.

Falcon and saker, on each tower,
Stood prompt their deadly hail to shower.

Scott, I. of I. M., iv. 17.

culver-dung (kul'vŕr-dung), n. The droppings of pigeons.

culverfoot (kul'vŕr-fŭt), n. [< culver + foot.] A species of crane's-bill, Geranium columbinum, the leaves of which are obovate like a bird's foot.

culver-house (kul'vŕr-hous), n. [< ME. culver, culver-hous; < culver + house.] A dovecote.

Under thi culver hous in alle the brede

culverin (kul'vŕr-in), n. [< OF. coulverine, coulverine, F. coulverine, < ML. colubrina, a culverin, dim. of colubra (< OF. coulverre), a culverin, lit. a serpent, < L. colubra, fem. of coluber, a serpent: see Culver.] An early name of the cannon. (a) Loosely, any small gun: especially so used in the earliest days of artillery. (b) In the sixteenth century, the heaviest gun in ordinary use, as on shipboard or the like, corresponding nearly to the long 18-pounders of later times. It is also mentioned as throwing a shot of 15 pounds weight. In the seventeenth century the name was retained for this piece, though much heavier guns were in use. Also called culver and whole culverin. See semi-culverin. Sometimes spelled culverina.

Hurrah! the foes are moving! Hark to the mingled din
Of fire, and steel, and trumpet, and drum, and roaring culverin.

Macaulay, 177.

The Constable advanced with four pieces of heavy artillery, four culverines, and four lighter pieces.

Motley, Dutch Republic, I. 177.

Bastard culverin, in the sixteenth century, a cannon smaller than the culverin, firing a projectile usually from 5 to 8 pounds in weight.

culverineer (kul'vŕr-in-ŕr'), n. [< culverin + -eer.] One who had charge of the loading and firing of a culverin.

Even as late as the 15th century a guild was founded at Ghent, composed of the culverineers, arquebusiers, and gunners, in order to teach the burghers the use of fire-arms.

culverkey (kul'vŕr-kŕ), n. [Appar. < culver, a dove, + key, the husk containing the seed of an ash (or maple): see ash-key and maple-key]; but the connection of culver, a dove, with the ash-tree is not obvious. Columbine and culver, however, are (prob.) etymologically related (ult. < L. columbus, a dove): see culver.] 1. A bunch of the pods of the ash-tree.—2. A meadow-flower, probably the bluebell, Scilla nutans.

Looking down the meadows, [I] could see, here a boy gathering lilies and lady-smocks, and there a girl cropping culverkeys and cowslips.

I. Walton, Complete Angler, xi.

Purple narcissus like the morning rays,
Pale gander-grass, and azure cowslips.

J. Davers, quoted in I. Walton's Complete Angler, 1.

Culver's-phynic (kul'vŕr-fŭn'ik), n. [After a Dr. Culver, who used it in his practice.] The popular name of Veronica (Leptandra) virginica. The thick, blackish root has a nauseous, bitter taste, acting as a violent emeto-cathartic, and has long been in use in medicine.

Culver's-root (kul'vŕr-rŭt), n. Same as Culver's-phynic.

culvert (kul'vŕt), n. [Appar. an accom., in imitation of cover, a covered place, of F. coulvertre, a channel, gutter, also a colander, < culer, run, drain: see cullis, colander.] An arched or flat-covered drain of brickwork or masonry carried under a road, railroad, canal, etc., for the passage of water.

culvert, a. [ME. also culvert, culward, < OF. culvert, culvert, culvert, culvert, culvert, culvert, also culbert, culbert (ML. culbertus, also, after F., culberta), low, servile, as noun a serf, vassal: see culbert.] False; villainous.

The porter is culvert and felon.

King Horn (E. E. T. S.), p. 60.

The king held a steward
That was fel and culvert.

Chron. of Eng. (Ritson's Metr. Rom., II.), 1. 787.

culvertage (kul'vŕt-ŕj), n. [< OF. culvertage, culvertage, culvertage (ML. culvertagium), < culvert, serf, vassal: see culvert.] In early Eng. law, the forfeiture by tenant or vassal of his holding and his position as a freeman, resulting in a condition of servitude.

Vnder paine of Culvertage and perpetuall servitude.

In early times attendance at the posse comitatus was enforced by the penalty of culvertage, or turntail, viz. forfeiture of property and perpetual servitude.

Encyc. Brit., VIII. 446.

culvertail (kul'vŕr-tŕl), n. [< culvert + tail. < OF. dovetail.] In joinery and carp., a dovetail joint, as the fastening of a ship's earlings into the beam.

culvertail (kul'vŕr-tŕl), a. United or fastened, as pieces of timber, by a dovetail joint; dovetailed: used by shipwrights.

culvertship, n. [ME. culvertship; < culver + -ship.] Falsehood; wickedness.

Anon. Rhed., p. 204.

culverwort (kul'vŕr-wŕrt), n. [< culver + wort.] The columbine, Aquilegia vulgaris: so named from the resemblance of its flowers to the heads of little pigeons around a dish. See out under columbine.

culy, n. See kuk.

cunin, v. An obsolete spelling of come.

Cuma (kŭ'mŕ), n. [NL., appar. for **Cyma* (see cyma, in other senses), < Gr. κύμα, a wave, a waved molding, etc.: see cyma, cymic.] 1. In conch., a genus of rhachiglossate pectinibranchiate gastropods, of the family Muricidae. Hemphrys, 1795.—2. A genus of crustaceans, of the family Cumidae, also giving name to a group Cumacea. Also **Cyma*.

Cumacea (kŭ-mŕ-sŕ-jŕ), n. pl. [NL., < Cuma + -acea.] A group of thoracostracous crustaceans, of which the type is the genus Cuma. The Cumacea resemble the arthropodous Crustacea in having eyes without a movable stalk; but they closely resemble the Schizopoda in the form of the body, thus corresponding with the lower developmental stages of the decapodous crustaceans.

The Cumacea . . . are very remarkable forms allied to the Schizopoda and Nebalia on the one hand, and on the other to the Eriophthalmia and Copepoda; while they appear, in many respects, to represent persistent larvae of the higher Crustacea.

cumacean (kŭ-mŕ-sŕ-jŕ), a. and n. 1. a. Of or pertaining to the Cumacea. Also cumaceous.

II. n. A member of the Cumacea.

cumaceous (kŭ-mŕ-sŕ-jŕ), a. Same as cumacean.

Cumman (kŭ-mŕ'n), a. Of or pertaining to Cumæ, an ancient city on the coast of Campania, reputed the earliest of the Greek settlements in Italy.—Cumman sibyl, one of the legendary prophetic women whose authority in matters of divination was acknowledged by the Romans. See sibyl.

cumarin (kŭ'mŕ-rin), n. Same as coumarin.
cumbent (kum'bŕnt), a. [*< L. *cumben(-t-), ppr. of *cumbere* (only in comp. concumbere, incumbere, etc.), nasalized form of cubare, lie down: see cubit, and cf. accumbent, incumben, procumbent, recumbent.] Lying down; reclining; recumbent. [Rare.]

At the fountains are as many cumbent figures of marble under very large niches of stone.

Enslin, Diary, Nov. 12, 1844.

A handsome monument of Caen stone, being a cumbent effigy on an altar-tomb, was placed on the north side of the chancel [in Whalley church] in 1842.

Baines, Hist. Lancashire, II. 7, note.

cumber (kum'bŕr), v. t. [*< ME. cumbren, cumbren, < OF. cumbren, hinder, obstruct, commonly in comp. encumbren, F. encumbren = Pr. encumbren = It. ingombren, < ML. incumbere, hinder, obstruct, encumber, < L. in- + ML. *cumbere, cumbere, obstruction, etc., < L. cumbus, a heap: see cumber, n., and cf. encumber, of which cumber, v., is in part an abbreviated form.*] 1. To burden or obstruct with or as with a load or weight, or any impediment; load excessively or uselessly; press upon; shake up; elogi.

Behold, these three years I come seeking fruit on this fig tree, and find none: cut it down; why cumberest thou the ground?

Luke xiii. 7.

A variety of frivolous arguments cumber the memory to no purpose.

The fallen images

Dryden, Rymn to Death.

The whole slope is cumbered by masses of rock.

Tyndal, Forms of Water, p. 44.

2. To be a clog to; hinder by obstruction; hamper in movement.

Why asks he what avails him not in fight,
And would but cumber and retard his right?

Dryden.

3. To trouble; perplex; embarrass; distract.

For gif thou comest again Conscience thou cumberest this sleight.

And so wikkedeth goddes word and hallowit both.

Piers Plowman (A), x. 81.

Domestic fury, and fierce civil strife,
Small cumber all the parts of Italy.

Shak., J. C., III. 1.

cumber (kum'bŕr), n. [This noun, though later than the verb in E., and derived from it, is in the other tongues the orig. of the verb. Formerly also written cumber; < OF. cumbre, an obstruction of stakes, etc., in a river to catch ber, extent, amount, or force of (things of the same kind): as, cumulative materials; cumulative arguments or testimony. See below.—2. Increasing by successive additions: as, the cumulative action of a force.

I cannot help thinking that the indefinable something which we call character is cumulative—that the influence of the same climate, scenery, and associations for several generations is necessary to its gathering head, and that the process is disturbed by continual change of place.

Lovell, Firebird Travels, p. 90.

No modern writer save De Quincey has sustained himself so easily and with such cumulative force through passages which strain the reader's mental power.

Stedman, Viet. Poets, p. 401.

34. Composed of aggregated parts; composite; brought together by degrees.

As for knowledge which man receiveth by teaching, it is cumulative and not original.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II. 147.

Cumulative action, in med., the property of producing considerable, and more or less sudden, effect after a large number of apparently ineffective doses as of a drug or poison.—Cumulative argument, an argumentation whose force lies in the concurrence of different probable arguments tending to one conclusion.—Cumulative dividend. See dividend.—Cumulative evidence, evidence of which the parts reinforce one another, producing an effect stronger than any part taken by itself.—Cumulative language, several legumes in the same will to the same person which, though present in the same or similar language, are such as to be deemed additional to one another, and not merely a repeated expression of one intention already expressed.—Cumulative offense, in law, an offense committed by a repetition of acts of the same kind, on the same day or on different days. Hard.—Cumulative sentence, in law, a sentence in which several fines or several terms of imprisonment are added together, on account of conviction of several similar offenses.—Cumulative system of voting, in elections, that system by which each voter has the same number, or within one of the same number, of votes as there are persons to be elected to a given office, and can give them all to one candidate or distribute them, as he pleases. This variety of proportional or minority representation is practised in elections to the Illinois House of Representatives, and to some extent in the Illinois elections.

Cumulatively (kū-mū-lā-tiv-ly), adv. In a cumulative manner; increasingly; by successive additions.

As time goes on and our knowledge of the planetary motions becomes more minutely precise, this method of determining the parallax of the sun will become continually and cumulatively more exact. C. A. Young, The Sun, p. 41.

cumuli, n. Plural of cumulus.

cumuliform (kū-mū-lī-fōrm), a. [L. cumulus, a heap, + forma, form.] Having the form of cumuli; cumulous; cumulose: applied to clouds.

The cuneiform inscriptions of the ancient Mesopotamians are not of historical import, like the Egyptian, but have reference only to the business transactions of the time. Von Soden, Unters. über die altbab. Inschr., p. 11.

(b) In entom., said of parts or joints which are attached by a thin but broad base, and thicken gradually to a suddenly truncated apex. (c) In anat., applied to certain wedge-shaped carpal and tarsal bones. See phalange below.

2. Occupied with or versed in the wedge-shaped characters, or the inscriptions written in them: as, "a cuneiform scholar," Sir H. Rawlinson.

Cuneiform bone, in anat.: (a) A carpal bone at the ulnar side of the proximal row. Also called the triquetrum and pyramide, from its shape in the human subject. See cut under anatomical. (b) One of three bones of the foot, of the distal row of tarsal bones, on the inner side of the foot, in relation with the first three metatarsal bones. The cuneiform bones are distinguished from one another as the inner cuneoid, and outer, or the outer cuneiform, mesocuneiform, and cercuncuneiform; also as the entocuneiform, mesocuneiform, and extercuneiform. In the human foot they are wedged in between the scaphoid, the cuboid, and the heads of three metatarsals, and fitted to one another like the stones of an arch. These bones contribute much to the elasticity of the arch of the instep. See cut under foot.—Cuneiform cartilage. See cartilage.—Cuneiform column, Burdach's columns (which see, under column).—Cuneiform deformation of the skull. See deformation.—Cuneiform palpi, those palpi in which the last joint is cuneiform.—Cuneiform tubercles, the cartilages of Wrisberg.

II. n. A cuneiform bone: as, the three cuneiforms of the foot.

cuneiforme (kū-nē-ī-fōrm'ē), n.; pl. cuneiformis (-mī-ē). [NL., neut. (sc. os, bone) of cuneiformis: see cuneiform.] One of the cuneiform bones of the wrist or of the instep: more fully called os cuneiforme, plural ossa cuneiformia. The three tarsal cuneiform bones are distinguished as cuneiforme internum, medium, and externum.

Cuneirostris (kū-nē-ī-rostr'ē), n. pl. [NL., L. cuneus, a wedge, + rostrum, beak.] In Blyth's system of classification (1849), a series or superfamily of his Picoides, consisting of the woodpeckers, honey-guides, and barbets: opposed to Levirostris.

cuneocuboid (kū-nē-ō-kū'boid), a. [L. cuneiform + cuboid.] In anat., pertaining to the cuneiform bones and the cuboides.

cuneoscapoid (kū-nē-ō-skaf'oid), a. [L. cuneiform + scapoid.] In anat., pertaining to the cuneiform bones and the scapoid.

cunette (kū-net'), n. [F., appar. dim. formed from L. cuneus, a wedge.] In fort.: (a) A deep trench sunk along the middle of a dry moat, to make the passage more difficult. (b) A small drain dug along the middle of the main ditch, to receive the surface-water and keep the ditch dry.

cuneus (kū-nē-us), n.; pl. cunei (-i). [NL., L. cuneus, a wedge, ML. also a corner, angle, a stamp, die, OF. coin, E. coin: see coin.] Hence cuneate, cuneiform, etc.] 1. In anat., the triangular lobule on the median surface of the cerebrum, bounded by the parieto-occipital and calcarine fissures. See cerebrum.—2. In entom., a triangular part of the hemelytrum found in certain heteropterous insects, inserted like a wedge on the outer side between the corium and the membrane. It is generally of a more or less coriaceous consistence, and is separated from the corium by a flexible suture. Also called appendix.

cuniculate (kū-nik'ū-lāt), a. [L. cuniculus, a passage underground, a cavity, cuniculus, a rabbit: see cuniculus.] In bot., traversed by a long passage open at one end, as the peduncle of Tropaeolum.

cuniculi, n. Plural of cuniculus.

cuniculous (kū-nik'ū-lus), a. [L. cuniculus, a rabbit, cony: see cuniculus.] Relating to rabbits. [Rare.]

cuniculus (kū-nik'ū-lus), n.; pl. cuniculi (-li). [L., also cuniculum, a canal, cavity, hole, pit, mine, an underground passage, lit. a (rabbit) burrow, cuniculus, a rabbit, cony, whence ult. E. cony, q. v.] 1. In archaeol., a small underground passage; specifically, one of the underground drains which formed a close network throughout the Roman Campagna and certain other districts of Italy. They were constructed by a race that was dominant before the age of Roman supremacy, and are now known to have remedied the malarious character of those regions, which has returned since they were choked up.

2. [cop.] [NL.] A genus of lemmings, of the family Muridae and subfamily Arvicolinae: so called because the animals somewhat resemble small rabbits. The cranial and dental characters are diagnostic: there are no obvious external ears, the feet and tail are short and densely furred, the pollex is rudimentary, and the two middle fore claws are proportionally enlarged, and often duplicated by a secondary deciduous growth of horny substance. C. lemmings (or torquatus) is the Hudson's Bay lemming or hare-tailed rat of arctic America, Greenland, or corresponding latitudes in the old see coupe, coupe = Fr. Sp. copa = It. cuppa, cuppa, a cup, < ML. cupa, cuppa, cupa, cuppa, a cup, drinking-vessel, L. cupa, a tub, cask, tun, vat, etc., = Oulg. cupa, a cup; cf. Gr. κύπελλον, a cup, κύπελος (a hollow), a kind of ship, κύπελος, a hole, Skt. kāpa, a pit, well, hollow. The forms have been to some extent confused with those of cop, the head, top (= D. kop = G. kopf, etc.); see cop.] 1. A small vessel used to contain liquids generally; a drinking-vessel; a chalice. The name is commonly given specifically to a drinking-vessel smaller at the base than at the top, without a stem and foot, and with or without a handle or handles. See glass, goblet, mug.

Also ther be vij grett Coppes of tyne gold garnished over with precious stony.

Torkington, Diary of Eng Travell, p. 11.
Look not thou upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth his colour in the cup. Prov. xlii. 31.

Specifically—2. That part of a drinking-cup or similar vessel which contains the liquid, as distinguished from the stem and foot when these are present.—3. Eccles., the chalice from which the wine is dispensed in the sacrament of the Lord's supper.—4. A cup-shaped or other vessel of precious metal, or by extension any elaborately wrought piece of plate, offered as a prize to be contended for in yacht- and horse-racing and other sports.

The King has bought seven horses successively, for which he has given 11,800 guineas, principally to win the cup at Ascot, which he has never accomplished.

Griville, Memoirs, June 24, 1822.

5. [cop.] The constellation Crater.—6. Something formed like a cup: as, the cup of an acorn, of a flower, etc.

The cowslip's golden cup no more I see.

Shenstone, Elegies, vii.

Specifically—(a) In bot.: (1) The concave fruiting body of angiocarpous lichens and discomycetous fungi: same as discocarp and apothecium. (2) The peridium of a cluster-cup fungus, Ascidium. (b) In golding, a small cavity or hole in the course, probably made by the stroke of a previous player. Jamieson.

7. In steam-boilers, one of a series of depressions or domes used to increase the amount of heating surface.—8. A cupping-glass.

For the flux, there is no better medicine than the cup used two or three times.

Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 474.

9. A small vessel of determinate size for receiving the blood during venesection. It has usually contained about four ounces. A bleeding of two cups is consequently one of eight ounces. Dugliss.

10. The quantity contained in a cup; the contents of a cup: as, a cup of tea.

Every inordinate cup is unblest, and the ingredient is a devil.

Shak., Othello, II. 2.

And now let's go to an honest alehouse, where we may have a cup of good barley wine.

I. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 80.

'Tis a little thing

To give a cup of water. Talford, Ion, I. 2.

11. Suffering to be endured; evil which falls to one's lot; portion: from the idea of a bitter or poisonous draught from a cup.

O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me.

Mat. xvi. 28.

Welcome the sour cup of prosperity! Affliction may one day smile again.

12. A drink made of wine, generally iced, sweetened, and flavored according to many different receipts, and sometimes containing many ingredients. The different varieties are named from the chief ingredient, as claret-cup, champagne-cup, etc.—13. pl. The drinking of intoxicating liquors; a drinking-bout; intoxication.

Another sort sitteth upon their ale benches, and there among their cup they give judgment of the wits of writers.

Sir T. More, Utopia, Ded. to Peter Gilles, p. 14.

Thence from cup to civil broils. Milton, P. L., II. 118.

14. In golf, a small shallow hole in the course, frequently made by the stroke of some previous player having removed turf. W. Park, Jr.—Circe's cup, the enchanted draught of the sorceress Circe; hence, anything that produces a delicious or transforming effect.

I think you all have drunk of Circe's cup.

Shak., C. of E., v. 1.

Glass cup. See glass.—Coin-cup. See coin.—Crowned cup. See crowned.—Crown of cups. See couronne des tasses, under couronne.—Cup and ball. A toy of very early origin, consisting of a cup at the extremity of a handle, to which a ball is attached by a cord. The player tosses the ball up, and seeks to catch it in the cup.—Cup-and-ball joint. Same as ball-and-socket joint (which see, under ball).—Cup and can. familiar companions: the can being the large vessel out of which the cup is filled, and thus the two being constantly associated.

You boasting tell us where you din'd,
And how his lordship was so kind,
Swear he's a most facetious man,
That you and he are cup and can.

Swift.

Cup of assay. See assay.—Cup of sorrow, a pluck of snuff. Groat. [Prov. Eng.]—In his cup, intoxicated; tipsy.

As Alexander killed his friend Clytus, being in his ale and his cup.

Shak., Hen. V., IV. 7.

Standing cup, a large and usually ornamental drinking-vessel (see happ) made especially for the decoration of a dresser or cupboard.—To crush a cup. See crush.—To drain the cup to the bottom, or to the dregs. (a) To endure misfortune to the last extremity; experience the utmost force of a calamity. (b) To pursue sensual pleasures recklessly; sound the depths of vice, or of a particular form of indulgence.—To present the cup to one's lips. (a) To try to force one into a desperate action or painful position. (b) To allure one into dissipation or sensual indulgence.

cup (kup), v.; pret. and pp. cupped, ppr. cupping. [cup, n.] I. trans. 1. To supply with cups, as of liquor.

Plumpy Bacchus, . . .

Cup us, till the world go round.

Shak., A. and C., II. 7 (song).

2. To make drunk.

At night with one that had bin shrieve I sup'd,
Well entertain'd I was, and half well cup'd.

John Taylor, Works (1630).

3. To bleed by means of cupping-glasses; perform the operation of cupping upon.

Him, the damn'd doctors and his friends immur'd;
They bled, they cup'd d, they purged; in short they cur'd.

Pope, Imit. of Horace, II. II. 103.

II. intrans. 1. To drink.

The former is not more thirsty after his cupping than the latter is hungry after his devouring.

Res. T. Adams, Works, I. 484.

2. To perform the operation of cupping: as, to cup for inflammation.—3. In golfing, to hit or break the ground with the club when striking the ball. Jamieson.

cup-and-cone (kup'and-kōn'), n. In metal, an arrangement at the mouth of a blast-furnace by which ore, flux, or fuel can be added, without allowing any sensible escape of the furnace-gases, when these, as is usually the case, are taken off for heating purposes.

cup-and-saucer (kup'and-sā'sēr), a. Shaped like a cup and its saucer taken together.—Cup-and-saucer limpet, a shell of the genus Calyptrea so named because the limpet-like shell has a cup-like process in the interior.

cup-anvil (kup'an'vil'), n. In a metallic cartridge, a cup-shaped piece placed on the inner side of the head to strengthen it.

cup-bearer (kup'bār'er), n. 1. An attendant at a feast who conveys wine or other liquors to the guests.—2. Formerly, an officer of the household of a prince or noble, who tasted the wine before handing it to his master.

For I was the king's cup-bearer.

Neh. I. 11.

cupboard (kub'erd), n. [Early mod. E. also cupbord, cupbord, often spelled cupbord, sometimes cobord, to suit the pron.; ME. cupbord, cupbord, < cup, cuppe, cup, + board, board.]

1. Originally, a table on which cups and other vessels, of gold or silver, or of earthenware, for household use or ornament, were kept or displayed; later, a table with shelves, a sideboard, buffet, or cabinet, open or closed, used for such purpose; in modern use, generally, a series of shelves, inclosed or placed in a closet, for keeping cups, dishes, and other table-ware. A cupboard of large size and lavish ornament, in the second form, was called a court-cupboard, and was especially intended for the display of plate, etc. This form is represented by the modern sideboard, with open shelves above and a closet below.

The kynges cup-borde was closed in silver.

Morie Arthure (R. E. T. S.), I. 205.

2. A similar sideboard, cabinet, or closet of shelves for the keeping of provisions about to be used. Such a cupboard was formerly called specifically a livery-cupboard, and in it was placed the ration, called livery, allowed to each member of the household.

Going to a corner cupboard, high up in the wall, he pulled a key out of his pocket, and unlocked his little store of wine, and cake, and spirits.

Mrs. Gaskell, Sylvia's Lovers, III.

Hence—3. The set or collection of silver or gold plate, fine glass, decorated ceramic ware, etc., usually kept in a cupboard. Compare ordnance, 4.

There was also a Cupbord of plate, most sumptuous and rich.

Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 312.

Cupboard love, interested attachment.

A cupboard love is seldom true,

A love sincere is found in few. Poor Robin.

cupboard (kub'erd), v. t. [cupboard, n.] To gather as into a cupboard; hoard up.

Only like a gulf it [the belly] did remain
In the midst of the body, tide and unchange, Still absorbing the viand. Shak., Cor., I. 1.

cupboard (kub'erd), v. t. [cupboard + -d.] Like a cupboard. Moss Braddon.

cup-coral (kup'kor'al), n. 1. A corallite.—2. A coral polypoid of which the whole mass is cup-shaped, as in the family Cyathophylidae.

cupes (kū-pé'), n. A head-dress of lace, gauze, etc., having lappets hanging down beside the face. It was worn at the beginning of the eighteenth century, and preceded the tall commode.

cupel (kū'pel or kup'el), n. [Also written cupel, cupple, and coppel, coppie (now commonly cupel, based directly upon the ML. form); < F. cupelle = Sp. cupela = Pg. cupella, cupella = It. coppella, < ML. cupella, a little cup, a little tun, dim. of cupa, cup, L. cupa, a tun (> cupella, a small cask; see cup.] In metal, a small vessel made of pulverized bone-earth, in the form of a frustum of a cone, with a cavity in the larger end, in which lead containing gold and silver is cupelled. See cupellation. In assaying with the cupel the lead is absorbed by the porous bone-ash into which it sinks.

The stuff whereof cupples are made, which they put into furnaces, upon which fire worketh not.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

cupel (kū'pel), v. t.; pret. and pp. cupeled, cupelled, ppr. cupeling, cupelling. [cupel, n.] To perform the process of cupellation upon.

These [silver and alloyed gold] are wrapped together in a piece of sheet lead, and cupelled or melted in a porous crucible called a cupel. Wheatley and Delamotte, Art Work in Gold and Silver, p. 2.

cupel-dust (kū'pel-dust), n. Powder used in purifying metals. Also coppie-dust.

cupellate (kū-pe-lāt), v. t. [cupel + -ate.] To cupel. [Rare.]

cupellation (kū-pe-lā'shōn), n. [cupellate + -ion.] Separation of gold and silver from lead by treatment in a cupelling-furnace or in a cupel. The process depends upon the property possessed by lead of becoming oxidized when strongly heated, while the precious metals are not so affected. The lead, becoming oxidized, forms litharge, which collects on the surface and flows toward the edges of the metallic mass, whence it is removed, the silver remaining in the form of a metallic disk if the operation is on a large scale, as in the process of working argentiferous lead in the cupellation-furnace, or in that of a small rounded globe or button if the cupel is used (see cupel), as is commonly done in assaying silver ore which contains gold.

Cupes (kū'pēs), n. [NL. (Fabricius, 1801), < (f) L. cuppes, cuppes, fond of delicacies, dainty, connected with cupedo, cuppedo, a tidbit, delicacy, orig. = cupido, desire; see (upid).] The typical genus of the family Cupessidae. C. lobiceps is a North American species.

Cupessidae (kū-pēs'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cupes + -idae.] A family of sericicorn Coleoptera or beetles. The ventral segments are free; the tarsi are five-jointed; the first ventral segment is not elongated; the hind coxae are sulate for the reception of the thighs; the front coxae are transverse; the corymbium is small or wanting; the head is constricted behind; and the eyes are smooth. The family comprises only the three genera Cupes, Priacma, and Omma, and the few species known are sordid-colored beetles of medium size, which probably breed in decaying wood.

cupful (kup'fūl), n. [cup + -ful, 3.] The quantity that a cup holds; the contents of a cup.

Thane who wente to the welle by the wode enis,
That alle welde of wyne, and wonderliche ryunes;
Kauhte up a cuppe-fulle, and coverde it faire.

Morie Arthure (R. E. T. S.), I. 229.

cup-gall (kup'gāl), n. A singular kind of gall found on the leaves of the oak and some other trees, of the figure of a cup, or a drinking-glass without its foot, adhering by its point or apex to the leaf, and containing the larva of a small fly. The insect which makes cup-galls is Cecidomyia poculorum.

cup-guard (kup'gārd), n. A sword-guard in which the hand is protected by a hollow metal cup opening toward the hand. It usually surrounds the blade beyond and outside of the cross-guard. See Mit.

Cuphea (kū'fē-ā), n. [NL., with reference to the gibbous base of the calyx, < Gr. κύπελος, a hump.] A genus of Lythraeae, herbs or undershrubs, natives of tropical America and Mexico, of which three species occur in the United States. Many have bright-colored flowers, and one, C. plicatissima, is common in greenhouses under the name of cupressus. See Cupressus.

Flowering branch of Cuphea leucodonta.

Cupress, n. See Cupress.
cup-shaped (kup'hil'ted), a. Furnished with a cup-shaped or saucer-shaped apothecium, as Leconia tartarea. Also called cup-moss.
Cupid (kū'pid), n. [L. Cupido, personification of cupido (cupido), desire, passion, < cupere, desire: see coveit.] In Rom. myth., the god of love, identified with the Greek Eros, the son of Hermes (Mercury) and Aphrodite (Venus). He is generally represented as a beautiful boy with wings, carrying a bow and quiver of arrows, and is often spoken of as blind or blindfolded. The name is often given in art to figures of children, with or without wings, introduced, sometimes in considerable number, as a motive of decoration, and with little or no mythological allusion.

Cupid.—Vatican Museum, Rome.

The seal was Cupid bent above a scroll, And o'er his head Uranian Venus hung, And raised the blinding bandage from his eyes.

To look for Cupids in the eyes. Same as to look babies, etc. (which see, under baby, n.).

Drayton, Polyolbion, li. 802.

cupidity (kū'pid-i-ti), n. [F. cupidité = Pr. cupiditas = It. cupidità, < L. cupiditas (-s), desire, covetousness, < cupido, desirous, < cupere, desire: see coveit.] 1. An eager desire to possess something; inordinate desire; immoderate craving, especially for wealth or power; greed.

No property is secure when it becomes large enough to tempt the cupidity of indigent power.

Burke.

Many articles that might have aroused the cupidity of unambitious thieves.

2. Specifically, sexual love. [Rare.]

Love, as it is called by boys and girls, shall even be the subject of my ridicule. . . . villainous cupidity!

Richardson, Sir Charles Grandison, VI. 106.

—Syn. 1. Concupiscence, Cupidity, etc. (see concupiscence), craving, hankering, grasping, lust for wealth, etc.

cupidom (kū'pi-dŏn), n. [F. Cupidon, < L. Cupido, Cupid: see Cupid.] A flowering plant of gardens, Catananche corymbosa.

Cupidonia (kū'pi-dŏ-ni-ŏ), n. [NL. (Reichenbach, 1858), extended from cupido, the specific name of the bird, < L. Cupido, Cupid.] A genus of gallinaceous birds of the grouse family, Tetraoidea; the pinnated grouse. They have small or little wing-like tufts of feathers on the sides of the neck, which may have been fancifully likened to Cupid's wings; a short tail with broad feathers; the head somewhat crested; the lower partly feathered; and the plumage barred crosswise on the under parts. The genus is based upon the common prælie-bum of the United States, Cupidonia cupido. A second smaller kind is C. pallidicincta. Also called Tympanuchus.

cupidous, a. [L. cupidus, desiring, desirous, longing, < cupere, desire, long for: see coveit.] Full of cupidity. Coles, 1717.

Cupid's-wing (kū'pids-wing), n. A piece of leather at the top of the cheek in a pianoforte-action. Sometimes called ey.

cupiscous (kū'pi-skŏs), a. [LL. cupiscous (-s), pr. of cupiscere, wish, < L. cupere, desire: see Cupid, coveit.] Same as concupiscous.

cup-land (kup'land), n. In British India, the depressed land along the rivers; the river-banks.

cup-leather (kup'low'n'er), n. A piece of leather fastened around the plunger or bucket of a pump. For a bucket it is sleeve-shaped, and for a plunger it is made with a solid bottom.

cup-liken (kup'h'ken), n. A lihen having a goblet-shaped podetium, as Cladonia pyxidata, or a cup-shaped or saucer-shaped apothecium, as Leconia tartarea. Also called cup-moss. See cup under cupbear.

cupman (kup'man), n.; pl. cupmen (-men). [Cup + man.] A boon companion; a fellow-reveler. [Rare.]

"Oh, a friend of mine! a brother cupman," . . . said Barbu, carelessly.

Bulwer, Last Days of Pompeii, li. 1.

cupmeal, adv. [ME. cupmole, cupmole; < cup + meal.] A cupful at a time; cup by cup.

A galoun [of ale] for a gode god wote, no lesse; And git it cam in cupmele.

Piers Plowman (B), v. 225.

cup-moss (kup'mŏs), n. [Cup + moss.] Same as cup-liken.

cup-mushroom (kup'mush'rŏm), n. See mush-room.

cupola (kū'pŏ-lŏ), n. [= F. coupole = Sp. cúpula = Pg. cupula, cupola = D. koepel = G. Dan. kuppel = Sw. kupol, < It. cupola, a dome, < LL. cupula, dim. of L. cupa, a tub, cask, ML. cupa, It. coppa, etc., a cup: see cup.] 1. In arch., a vault, either hemispherical or produced by the revolution about its axis of two curves intersecting at the apex, or by a semi-ellipse covering a circular or polygonal area, and supported either upon four arches or upon solid walls.

The Italian word signifies a hemispherical roof which covers a circular building, like the Pantheon at Rome or the temple of Vesta at Tivoli. Most modern cupolas are semi-elliptical, cut through their shortest diameter; but the greater number of ancient cupolas were hemispherical. In colloquial use the cupola is often considered as a diminutive dome, or the name is specifically applied to a small structure rising above a roof and often having the character of a tower or lantern, and in no sense that of a dome.

2. The round top of any structure, as of a furnace; the structure itself. See cupola-furnace. Specifically—3. Milit., a revolving shot-proof turret, formed of strong timbers, and armored with massive iron plates. In some systems of cupolas the tower is erected on a base which is made to turn on its center by means of steam-power. Within the turret heavy ordnance is placed, and fired through openings in the sides. Farrar, Mil. Encyc.

4. In anat.: (a) The summit of the cochlea.

(b) The summit of an intestinal gland. Frry.

—5. In conch., the so-called dorsal or visceral hump, made by the heap of viscera.

cupolad (kū'pŏ-lŏd), a. [Cupola + -ad.] Having a cupola.

Here is also another rich ebony cabinet cupolad with a tortoise-shell.

Now hast thou chang'd thy paint; and made Thyself a faun that a cupolad's.

Lowell, Lucasta.

cupola-furnace (kū'pŏ-lŏ-fŏr-nŏs), n. In metal., a shaft-furnace built more slightly than the ordinary blast-furnace, and usually of fire-brick, hooped or cased with iron. It is chiefly used for remelting cast-iron for foundry purposes.

cupulated (kū'pŏ-lŏ-ted), a. [Cupola + -at + -ed.] Having a cupola.

They show'd us Virgil's sepulchre erected on a steep rock, in forme of a small rotunda or cupulated column.

cuppa (kup'pŏ), n. [ML., a cup: see cup.] A cup; specifically, ecoles, the bowl or cup of a chalice or of a ciborium.

cupped (kupt), a. [Cup + -ed.] Depressed at the center like a cup; dished; cup-shaped.

In the original machine (type-writer) the keys were of bone, slightly cupped, with letters in relief, so that the blind could use it.

Sci. Amer., N. Y., LVI 276.

cupper (kup'er), n. 1. One who carries a cup; a cup-bearer.—2. One who applies a cupping-glass.

cupping (kup'ing), n. [Verbal n. of cup, v.]

1. In surg., the application of the cupping-glass. There are two modes of cupping: one in which the part is scarified and some blood taken away to relieve congestion or inflammation of internal parts, called wet cupping, or more generally simply cupping; and a second, termed dry cupping, in which there is no scarification and no blood is abstracted.

2. A concavity in the end of a cylindrical casting, produced by the shrinkage of the metal.—3. A shallow counter-sink.

cupping-glass (kup'ing-glas), n. A glass vessel like a cup applied to the skin in the operation of cupping. The air within is rarefied by heat or otherwise, so that when applied to the skin a partial vacuum is produced, and the part to which it is applied swells up into the glass. Where the object is blood-letting there is inside the cupping-glass an apparatus called a scarificator, furnished with fine lancets operated by a screw or trigger, by which the skin is cut, or the skin is cut by similar instrument before the cupping-glass is used. Various forms of cupping-instruments are used.

Still at their books, they will not be pull'd off; They stick like cupping glasses.

cupping-house (kup'ing-hous), n. [< cupping, verbal n. (with reference to the cup that inebriates), + house.] A tavern.

How many of these madmen lavish out their short times in . . . playing, dicing, drinking, feasting, beating; a cupping-house, a vaulting-house, a gaming-house, share their means, lives, souls.

cupping-machine (kup'ing-mŏ-shŏn), n. The first machine used in the process of making metallic cartridge-cases. It consists of two stamps or dies, one working within the other. The outer one cuts the copper blank and the next pulls it into the shape of a cup, preparing it for drawing in other machines.

cupping-tool (kup'ing-tŏl), n. A cup-shaped blacksmith's swage.

cup-plant (kup'plant), n. The Sulphur perfoliatum, a tall, stout composite of the United States, with a square stem and large opposite leaves, the upper pairs connate at the base and forming a cup-like cavity. The flowers are large and yellow.

cupples (kup'pŏs), n. pl. In her., bar-gemel. See gemel.

cup-purse (kup'pŏrs), n. A long netted purse one or both ends of which are wrought upon a cup-formed mold to give it shape.

cuppy (kup'i), n. [Appar. < F. coupé, cut: see coupe.] In her., one of the furs composed of patches like potent, but arranged so that each is set against a patch of the same tincture, instead of alternated. It is always argent and azure unless otherwise blazoned. Also called potent counter-potent.

cuprate (kū'prŏt), n. [< cupr (ic) + -ate.] A salt of cupric acid.

cupress-bark (kū'prŏ-ŏ-bŏrk), n. [< LL. cupressa, cypress (< cuprum, copper) + bark.]

The bark of Remyia Parviana and R. pedunculata, trees of tropical South America, allied to Cinchona. It is of a copper-red color, and yields quinine and allied alkaloids.

cupressine (kū'prŏ-sin), n. [< cupressa (bark) + -ine.] An alkaloid obtained from the double alkaloid homocoumarin, found in a variety of cupress-bark, the product of Remyia pedunculata.

cupressous (kū'prŏ-sŏs), a. [< LL. cupressus, of copper, < cuprum, copper: see copper.] 1. Consisting of or containing copper; having the properties of copper.—2. Copper-colored; reddish-brown with a metallic luster.

I got a rare mass of golden and silver and bright cupressous fishes, which looked like a string of jewels.

Thoreau, Walden, p. 232.

Cupressous luster. See luster.

Cupressines (kū'pro-sin'ŏ-s), n. pl. [NL., < Cupressus + -in + -es.] A suborder of Coniferales, of which the genus Cupressus is the type, with opposite or ternate, mostly scale-like, and adnate leaves. It includes also the genera Juniperus, Chamaecyparis, Thuja, Labocedrus, Taxodium, and others of the old world.

Cupressites (kū'pro-si'tŏz), n. [NL., < Cupressus, q. v.] A genus of fossil plants considered to be closely allied to, if not identical with, the recent genus Cupressus (which see). This genus is one of those found in connection with amber, and in various later geological formations, especially the lignitic group of northern Germany. The forms found in the Permian and so characteristic of a part of that group, and which were formerly referred to Cupressites, are now put in the genus Ulmacites.

Cupressocrinidae (kū'pres-ŏ-krin'i-dŏs), n. pl. [NL., < Cupressocrinus + -idae.] A family of fossil crinoids or encrinites, named from the genus Cupressocrinus, having a cup-shaped calyx, ranging from the Devonian to the Carboniferous formation.

cupressocrinite (kū'pres-ŏ-ri-nit), n. [As Cupressocrinus + -ite.] An encrinite of the genus Cupressocrinus.

Cupressocrinus (kū'pres-ŏ-ri-nus), n. [NL., < L. cupressus, cypress, + Gr. κρῖν, lily.] A genus of encrinites.

Cupressus (kū'pres-us), n. [NL., < L. cupressus, rarely cupressus, in LL. cupressus: see cupress.] A genus of coniferous trees having small, scale-like, appressed or spreading acute leaves, as in the junipers, and cones formed of a small number of peltate woody scales, with several small angular seeds to each scale; the cypress. The common cypress of the old world is C. sempervirens, a native of the East.

The tree with erect appressed branches, having a slender pyramidal form, frequently planted in Mohammedan and other burying grounds, is a variety of this species, besides which there are three or four others in the Mediterranean region and central Asia. In North America there are seven or eight species, in Mexico, Arizona, and California. The wood is fragrant, compact, and durable.

Cone of Cypress (Cupressus)

cupric (kū'prīk), a. [< L. cuprum, copper, + -ic.] Pertaining to or of the nature of copper; derived from copper: as, cupric acid. Also cuprous.—Cupric compound, a compound into which the atom of copper enters with equivalence of two for example, CuO, cupric oxide. In a cuprous compound two atoms of copper enter, forming a bivalent group: for example, Cu<sub>2</sub>O, cuprous oxide.

cupuliferous (kū-pū-līf'ē-rus), a. [< L. cuprum, copper, + L. ferre, = E. bear, + -ous.] Producing or containing copper; copper-bearing: as, cupuliferous ore, or silver.

cuprite (kū'prīt), n. [< L. cuprum, copper, + -ite.] The red oxide of copper; red copper ore; a common ore of copper, of a bright-red color, occurring in isometric crystals (cubes, octahedrons, etc.), and also massive. It is sometimes found in capillary forms, as in the variety chalcotrichite.

cupro-ammonium (kū'prō-a-mō'ni-um), n. Same as copperized ammonia (which see, under copper).

cuproid (kū'proid), n. [< L. cuprum, copper, + Gr. eidos, form.] In crystal, a solid related to a tetrahedron, and contained under twelve equal triangles. It is the hemihedral form of the tetragonal trisectahedron or trapezohedron.

cupromagnetite (kū-prō-mag'ne-sīt), n. [< L. cuprum, copper, + ML. magnesianum, q. v., + -ite.] A hydrous sulphate of copper and magnesianum.

cuproscheelite (kū-prō-shē'līt), n. [< L. cuprum, copper, + scheelite.] A variety of scheelite containing several per cent. of copper oxide.

cuprose (kup'rōs), n. [Also cuprose; < cup or cup + rose.] Same as copper-rose.

cuprous (kū'prus), a. [< L. cuprum, copper, + -ous.] Same as cupric.

cupseed (kup'sēd), n. A tall, climbing, menispermaceous vine of the southern United States, Calyocarpum Lyons, with large lobed, cordate leaves and small greenish-white flowers. The fruit is a large drupe containing a bony seed hollowed out on one side like a cup.

cup-shaped (kup'shāpt), a. Shaped like a cup.—Cup-shaped organs, specifically, in some Hirudinea, bundles of tactile setae embedded in depressions of the integument of the head and body.

cup-shrimp (kup'shrimp), n. A shrimp, Palaeomon vulgaris, when so small as to be sold by measure, not by counting. [Local, British.]

cup-sponge (kup'spūnj), n. A kind of commercial sponge. The Turkey cup-sponge is Spongia adriatica, also called Levanti toilet-sponge.

cupula (kū'pū-lā), n.; pl. cupulae (-lā). [NL., a little cup, etc., dim. of ML. cupa, a cup: see cupola and cup.] Same as cupola.

cupular (kū'pū-lār), a. [< cupula + -ar.] Cup-shaped; resembling a small cup.

cupulatus (kū'pū-lāt), a. [< NL. cupulatus, < cupula, q. v.] Same as cupular.

cupule (kū'pūl), n. [< NL. cupula, q. v.] 1. A small cup-shaped depression, as in rock.

These cupules have not only various sizes in different stones, but even in the same stone differ considerably from one surface to another. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 113

2. In bot.: (a) A form of involucre, occurring in the oak, beech, chestnut, and hazel, consisting of bracts which in fruit cohere into a kind of cup.

(b) In fungi, a receptacle shaped like the cup of an acorn, as in Peziza.—

3. In entom., a little cup-shaped organ; specifically, one of the sucking-disks on the lower surface of the tarsi of certain aquatic beetles.

Also cupula.

Cupuliferous (kū-pū-līf'ē-rōs), n. pl. [NL., fem. pl. (see L. plantae, plants) of cupuliferus: see

Cupule
a, cupule of acorn; b, cupule of fungus (Peziza)

cupuliferous.] An important order of apetalous exogenous trees, including the oak, chestnut, beech, birch, etc. It is characterized by monocious flowers, of which the staminate are in aments and the pistillate have an inferior or naked 2- to 6-celled ovary, the cells having one or two ovules. The order is divided into three tribes, each of which has been ranked as a distinct order: viz., Quercaceae (the Cupuliferus of many authors), which have the fruit surrounded or inclosed in a scaly or spiny involucre or cup, as in the oak, chestnut, and beech; Corylaceae, with the bracts of the involucre foliaceous and more or less united, as in the hazel and hornbeam; and Betulaceae, which have the scale-like bracts imbricate in a spike and the nutlets small and flattened, as in the birch and alder. The 10 genera include about 400 species, distributed over the temperate regions of the northern hemisphere.

cupuliferous (kū-pū-līf'ē-rus), a. [< NL. cupuliferus, < cupula, q. v., + L. ferre = E. bear.] In bot., bearing cupules.

cupuliform (kū'pū-līf'ōrm), a. [< NL. cupula, q. v., + L. forma, shape.] Shaped like or resembling a cupule; cupular.

cup-valve (kup'vālv), n. 1. A cup-shaped or conical valve which is guided by a stem to and from its flaring seat.—2. A valve placed like an inverted cup over an opening.—3. A form of balance-valve which opens simultaneously at the sides and top. E. H. Knight.

Cup-valve

cur (kūr), s. [< ME. kur, curre; of LG. or Scand. origin: = MD. korre, a house-dog, watch-dog; = Sw. dial. kurra, a dog. Prob. so called from his growling; cf. MD. **korren*, in comp. korrepot, equiv. to D. knorrepot (= Dan. knurrepotte), a grumbler, snarler (cf. MD. D. knorren = G. knurren = Dan. knurre, grumble, snarl); = Icel. kurra, grumble, murmur; = Sw. kurra, croak, rumble; = Dan. kurre, coo, whirr; cf. E. dial. curr, cry as an owl, Sc. curr, coo as a dove, purr as a cat, curdoo, curdoo, curroo, coo as a dove, currie-currie, expressive of a noisy habitual growl. An imitative word: see curr, and cf. churr, churr, hurr, whurr.] 1. A dog: usually in depreciation, a snarling, worthless, or outcast dog; a dog of low or degenerate breed.

They . . . like to village curz,
Bark when their fellows do Shak., Hen VIII., II. 4
Hang, hair, like hemp, or like the laling curz
Fletcher (and another), Queen of Corinth, iv. 1
Both mongrel, puppy, whelp, and hound,
And curs of low degree,
Goldsmith, Elegy on the Death of a Mad Dog

2. Figuratively, a surly, ill-bred man; a low, despicable, ill-natured fellow: used in contempt.

What would you have, you curz,
That like nor peace nor war? Shak., Cor., I. 1

curability (kūr-g-bil'itē), n. [= F. curabilité = It. curabilità, *< L. as if *curabilis* (t)-s, < curabilis: see curable.] The character of being curable; the fact of admitting of cure.

curable (kūr'g-bl), a. [= F. curable = Fr. Sp. curable = Pg. curavel = It. curabile, < L. curabilis, < L. curare, cure: see cure, v.] 1. Capable of being healed or cured; admitting a remedy: as, a curable disease or patient; a curable evil.

There be some Distempers of the Mind that proceed from those of the Body, and so are curable by Drugs and Diet. Howell, Letters, I. vi. 18

2. Capable of curing.

A curable vertue against all diseases. Sandys, Travels, III. 174

curableness (kūr'g-bl-nēs), n. Capability of being cured, healed, or remedied; curability.

The arguments which Belmont and others draw from the providence of God, for the curableness of all diseases. Boyle, Works, II. 110.

curacao (kū-ra-sō'), n. [So named from the island of Curacao, north of Venezuela. See curasow.] A cordial made of spirit sweetened and flavored with the peel of the bitter orange. Commonly written curacao.

curacao-bird (kū-ra-sō'berd), n. An old name of the Guianan curasow or mituporanga, Oraz alector: the crested curasow. Browne; Brisson, 1780.

curacao, n. Incorrect spelling of curacao.

curacy (kū'ra-sē), n.; pl. curacies (-sēs). [< curate + -cy; as if *< NL. *curacia*.] 1. The office or employment of a curate.

They get into orders as soon as they can, and if they be very fortunate, arrive in time to a curacy here in town. Swift.

2. The condition or office of a guardian; guardianship.

By way of curacy and protectorship. Hyper North, Essex, p. 200.

Perpetual curacy. See perpetual curate, under curate.

curari, curara (kū-rā'ri, -rē), n. [< S. Amer., also written curare, and in many variant forms, curari, curari, woorara, woorak, woorak, woorak, woorak, etc.] A brown-black, shining, brittle, resinous substance, consisting of the aqueous extract of Strychnos toxicaria, and various other species of the same genus, used by South American Indians for poisoning their arrows, especially the small arrows shot from the blow-gun. Curari may, except in very large doses, be introduced with impunity into the alimentary canal; but if introduced into a puncture of the skin so as to mix with the blood, the effect is instantly fatal. Its principal effect is paralysis of the terminations of the motor nerves, and it causes death by paralysis of the muscles of the chest, producing suffocation. The chief use of curari by the Indians is for the chase, animals killed by it being quite wholesome. It is largely used in physiological experiments, and to a small extent therapeutically in spasmodic affections, as tetanus, rabies, etc.

curarine (kū-rā'rin), n. [< curari + -ine.] An alkaloid extracted from curari, forming colorless prisms more poisonous than the curari which yields it. One hundredth of a gram introduced into the skin of a rabbit produces death in a short time.

curarisation (kū-rā-ri-sā'shōn), n. [< curaries + -ation.] The act or operation of curarizing; the state of being curarized.

curarise (kū-rā'ris), v. t.; pret. and pp. curarised, prp. curarising. [< curari + -ise.] To administer curari to; destroy the motor without destroying the sensory function of the nervous system by the use of curari, as in vivisection, when the animal is rendered motionless and voiceless, but not insensible to pain.

curasow (kū-ras'ō), n. [< curacao (bird): see curacao.] 1. One of the large gallinaceous South American birds of the genera Oraz and Pauxi, and the subfamily Crucinae. There are in all upward of 12 species. The best-known, and that to which the name was first applied, is the curasow bird or crested curasow, Oraz alector, of a greenish-black color with a white crest, inhabiting northern parts of South America. The red curasow is Oraz rubra, the galeated curasow or curasow-bird is Pauxi galeata; the red-knobbed curasow is Oraz (Oreoceryle) curuculata or parvirostris. The glibose curasow, O. glibosus, is notable as the northernmost species, and the only one found north of Panama; it ranges into Mexico. Several species of curasows are domesticated in their native country, and resemble the turkey in size and general character.

2. pl. The family Oreocidae.

Also spelled curasow, curasow, and also called hoco, mituporanga, and by other names.

curate, n. See curate.

curate, n. [Also curate, curist, appar. based on ML. curata, a curasow: see curasow, and cf. OF. curret, undressed leather, from same ult. source.] A curasow.

Enchanting on their curate with my blade,
That none so fair as fair Angelica. Greene, Orlando Furioso.

The mastiffs fierce that hunt the bristled bear
Are harnessed with curate light and strong. John Denney (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 179).

curate (kū'rāt), n. [< ME. curat = OFries. kurāt, < ML. curatus (> It. curato = F. curé), a priest, curate, prop. adj., having to do with the cure of souls, < L. cura, cure, care: see cure, n.] 1. According to former use, one who has the cure of souls; a priest; a minister.

When thou shalt be shaven of thy curat, tell him all all the sinners that thou hast done with thee were late survive. Chaucer, Priores's Tale.

Set down upon my Bishop, and Curate, and all Ungratefulness committed to their charge, the heavenly Spirit of thy grace.

Book of Common Prayer (Eng.), Prayer for Clergy and People.

The various kinds of benedict parochial clergy, such as rectors, vicars, and all other persons who are now styled in common parlance incumbents, and who in old times were generally known as curates, from their having cure of souls.

J. C. Jefferies, Book about the Clergy, I. 45.

2. In the Church of England, and in the Irish Roman Catholic Church, a clergyman employed under the incumbent (whether rector or vicar), either as assistant in the same church or in a chapel within the parish and connected with the church. The curate is the priest of lowest degree in the Church of England, he must be licensed by the bishop or ordinary. The term is now in use in the United States.

3. A guardian; a protector.—Perpetual curate, in Eng. curate law, formerly, a curate of a parish in which there was neither rector nor vicar, and the benefice of which was in possession and control of a layman. Perpetual curates have since 1808 been abolished, every incumbent of a church (not a rector) who is entitled to perform marriages, etc., and to appropriate the tithes, being now deemed a vicar and his benefice a vicarage.—Supercurate, in the Church of England, a curate who is licensed by the rector or vicar to serve for him, and may be removed at pleasure.

curate, n. See curate.

Shak, Hamlet, III. 4.

curb (kərb), n. 1. [In some senses formerly also kerb; < curb, t.] 1. That which checks, restrains, or holds back; restraint; check; control.

This is a defence to the adjoining country, a safe guard and a curb to the city
Sauvage, Travaux, p. 198.
Wild natures need wise curbs
Tennyson, Princess, v.
Specifically—2. A chain or strap attached to the upper ends of the branches of the bit of a bridle, and passing under the horse's lower jaw, used chiefly in controlling an unruly or high-spirited horse. The curb rein is attached to the lower ends of the reins, and when it is pulled the curb is pressed forward against the horse's jaw with a tendency to break it if the pressure is great. See curb under harness.

He that before ran in the pastures wild Felt the stiff curb control his angry jaws
Dryden, Belshazzar, IV.

To stop the mouths of our adversaries, and to bridle them with their own curb Milton, Prelatical Episcopacy.

3. A line of joined stones set upright at the outer edge of a walk, or at one of the edges of a street or road, forming the inner side of a gutter;
a row of curbstones. [In this and related uses formerly also spelled kerb.]—4. In arch.: (a) A breast-wall or retaining-wall erected to support a bank of earth. (b) A casing of stone, wood, brick, or iron, built inside a wall that is being sunk, or the framework above and around a well. (c) A boarded structure used to contain concrete until it hardens into a pier or foundation. (d) The outer casing of a turbine-wheel. (e) A curved shrouding which confines the water against the floats or buckets of a scoop-wheel or breast-wheel. (f) The wall-plate at the springing of a dome. (g) The wall-plate on the top of the permanent part of a windmill, on which the cap rotates as the wind veers. (h) An inclined circular plate placed round the edge of a kettle to prevent the contents from boiling over.

curba (kərb), n. An African measure of capacity, ranging at different places from 7½ to 15 gallons, used by the negroes in the sale of palm-oil, grain, pulse, etc. It may be a tub, a basket, or an earthen pot.

curbable (kərb-ə-bl), a. [a. F. curvable; as curb + -able.] Capable of being curbed or restrained. [Rare.]

curb-bit (kərb-bit), n. A form of bit for the bridle of a horse, which, by the exertion of slight effort, can be made to produce great pressure on the mouth, and thus control the animal. See curb, n. 2.

curb-chain (kərb-čān), n. A chain used as a check upon the motion of any moving piece of apparatus.

curb-key (kərb-kē), n. In teleg., a peculiar key used in operating submarine cables, designed to prevent the prolongation and confusion of signals growing out of induction.

ing no curb or restraint.

curbonly, n. Same as curb-bow. Grose, Milli-tary Antiquities.

curb-pin (kərb-pin), n. One of the pins on the lever of the regulator of a watch which embrace the hair-spring of the balance and regulate its vibrations. E. H. Knight.

curb-plate (kərb-plāt), n. 1. In arch.: (a)
The wall-plate of a circular or elliptical dome or roof. E. H. Knight. (b) In a curb-roof, the plate which receives the feet of the upper rafters. (c) The plate of a skylight.—2. The cylindrical frame of a well; a well-curb. See curb, n. 2, 4 (b).

curb-roof (kərb-rōf), n. In arch., a roof in which the rafters, instead of continuing straight down from the ridge to the walls, are received at a given height on plates, which in their turn are supported by rafters less inclined to the horizon, whose bearing is directly on the walls.

The roof thus presents a bent appearance, whence its name. The Mansard roof is a form of curb roof in which the slope of the lower section usually approaches the perpendicular, while that of the upper section approaches the horizontal, the angle between the two sections thus being strongly marked.

curb-sender (kərb-sen-dēr), n. An automatic signaling apparatus invented by Sir W. Thomson of Glasgow and Prof. Fleeming Jenkin of Edinburgh, used in submarine telegraphy.
The message is punched on a paper ribbon, which is then passed through the transmitting apparatus by clockwork.
The name is due to the fact that when a current of one kind of electricity is sent by the instrument, another of the opposite kind is sent immediately after to curb the first the effect of the second transmission being to make the indication produced by the first sharp and distinct, instead of slow and uncertain.

curbstones (kərb-stōn), n. 1. A stone placed against earth or brick- or stonework to prevent it from falling out or spreading.—2. Specifically, one of the stones set together on edge at the outer side of a sidewalk, forming a curb.

Formerly also spelled kerbstones, kerbstones.

Curculionidae (kərb-kū-li-on-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., <
Curculio (n-) + -idae.] A family of rhynchophorous Coleoptera or beetles; the weevils or snoutbeetles, one of the most extensive groups of coleopterous insects. They have a strong fold on the inner face of each of the elytra, the pygidium divided in the males, the tarsi generally dilated, brush-like beneath, and no accessory mandibular piece. There are over 1,500 genera, all found on plants. About 10,000 species are described, in all of which the head is prolonged into a beak or snout, and furnished at the tip with a minute pair of sharp horizontal jaws which are used by the insect in depositing its eggs, generally in the kernel of some fruit. See cuts under Anthonomus, bean-beetle, and Conotrachelus.

curia (kû'ri-â), n.; pl. curia (-â). [L.; senses 2 and 3 first in ML.] 1. In Rom. antiq.: (a) One of the divisions of the citizens of Rome, with reference to locality. The number of the curia is given as thirty, but the original number was smaller.

The Curia was a political and not a Gentile arrangement. . . . For the special relation of the Curia to the Civitas, a hint is found in the statement that Romulus gave each Curia one allotment.

W. H. Harris, Aryan Household, p. 284.

(b) The building in which a curia met for worship or public deliberation. (c) The building in which the senate held its deliberations. (d) A title given to the senate of any one of the Italian cities, as distinguished from the Roman senate. — 2. In medieval legal use, a court, either judicial, administrative, or legislative; a court of justice. In the Norman period of English history the Curia Regis was an assembly which the king was bound to consult on important state matters, and whose consent was necessary for the enactment of laws, the imposition of extraordinary taxes, etc. It consisted nominally of the tenants in chief, but practically it was much more limited. Originally the Curia Regis and the Exchequer were composed of the same persons. From the Curia Regis there developed later the Ordinary Council or Privy Council, and the Courts of King's Bench and Common Pleas. Also Aula Regis or Regia.

The council, as it existed in the Norman period under the name of curia regis, . . . exercised judicial, legislative, and administrative functions.

Encyc. Brit., XIX. 765.

3. [cap.] Specifically, in modern use, the court of the papal see.

The collusion, so to call it, between the crown and the papacy, as to the observance of the statute of provisions, extended also to the other dealings with the Curia.

It hath the primal eldest curse upon 't,
A brother's murder. Shak., Hamlet, III. 3.

Curse of Canaan, negro slavery; hence, in a satirical use, negro slaves collectively: in allusion to the curse pronounced by Noah upon Canaan, the son (or the descendants) of Ham (Gen. IX. 25, 26), negroes being formerly regarded by many as the descendants of Canaan, and their slavery being justified as an accomplishment of the curse.

Her thirds was part in cotton lands, part in the curse of Canaan. Lowell, Biglow Papers.

Curse of Scotland, the use of diamonds in playing-cards: so called probably from the resemblance of that card to the heraldic bearings of the Earls of Mar, one of whom was detected in Scotland as the principal author (while Master of Stair) of the massacre of Glasgow (1695). Other explanations have been proposed.—The curse, in Isaac, the sentence pronounced upon Adam and Eve, and through them upon the human race (Gen. III. 16-19), in consequence of the sin of Adam, and its fulfilment in the history of mankind.—Syn. 1. Accusation, Anathema, etc. See malediction.—2. Scourge, plague, affliction, ruin.

curse (kərs), v.; pret. and pp. curst (sometimes curst), pp. cursing. [ME. cursien, cursen, corson, curse (intr., utter oaths; trans., imprecate evil upon, put under ecclesiastical ban), < late AS. cursian (< corrian, in Benson and Lye, not authenticated), also in comp. forcurian (in pp. forcursed: see curst), curse; cf. curra, a curse: see curse, n. Cf. accurse.] I. trans. 1. To wish evil to; imprecate or invoke evil upon; call down calamity, injury, or destruction upon; execrate in speech.

Thou shalt not . . . curse the ruler of thy people. Ex. xxi. 28
Curse me this people, for they are too mighty for me. Num. xxi. 6.

Couldst thou not curse him? I command thee curse him, Curse all the gods here, and deliver him. Madge, No, they never speak. Nan, Are they curst?

Your fair land shall be rent and torn,
Your people be of all fortunes,
And all men curse you for this thing.

William Morris, Earthly Paradise, I. 307

Hence—2. To put under ecclesiastical ban or anathema; excommunicate; condemn or sentence to the disabilities of excommunication.

About this Time, at the Suit of the Lady Katharine Dwyer, a Bull was sent from the Pope, which curst both the King and the Realm. Baker, Chronicles, p. 252.

3. To bring or place a curse upon; blight or blast with a curse or malignant evils; vex, harass, or afflict with great calamities.

(On impious realms and barbarous kings impose
Thy plagues, and curse em with such sons as these. Pope.

Sure some fell fiend has curst our line,
That coward should e'er be son of mine! Scott, L. of L. M., IV. 11

II. intrans. To utter imprecations; affirm or deny with imprecations of divine vengeance; use blasphemous or profane language; swear. Then began he to curse and to swear. Mat. xxvi. 74.

curse (kərs), n. [The same word, with sense, as now popularly understood, imported from curse (and taken as equiv. to damn in similar uses), as ME. kers, kern, carre, crese, cross (the plant), often used as a symbol of valuelessness, 'not worth a kerse (crease)', 'care not a kerse', like mod. colloq. 'not worth a straw', etc.] Literally, a cross: in popular use identified with curse, an imprecation, and used only as a symbol of utter worthlessness in certain negative expressions: as, 'not worth a curse', 'to care not a curse', etc.

Wysdom and wit now is nat worth a curse
Bote hit be aided with countess as clothers kemben wolle. Piers Plowman (C), XII. 15

curstly (kərs'əd-ly), adv. 1. As one under a curse; miserably.

O, let him die as he hath liv'd, dishonourably, Basely and curstly! Middleton and Rowley, Spanish Gypsy, III. 2.

2. Detestably; abominably; execrably: used in malediction.

This is a nation that is curstly afraid of being overrun with too much politeness. Pope.

curstness (kərs'əd-nəs), n. [ME. curstness, curstness; < curst + -ness.] 1. The state of being under a curse, or of living doomed to execration or to evil.—2. Blasphemous, profane, or evil speech; cursing.

His mouth is full of curstness,
Of fraud, deceit, and guile.
Old metrical version of Psalms.

3. Shrewishness; maliciousness; contrariness.

My wyve curstness. Chaucer, Prol. to Merchant's Tale, l. 37.

cursement, n. [ME. coracment, < corcen, curcen, curse, + -ment.] Cursing.

Enuye with heavy herte asked after shrifte,
And criede "mes culpa," cursynge alle hus enemyes.
Hus clothes were of cursement and of kene wordes. Piers Plowman (C), VII. 65.

current, v. t. Another spelling of curse, variant of curst. See curst.

Nan, Do they speak as we do?
Madge, No, they never speak.
Nan, Are they current?
Madge, No, they call them infidels; I know not what they are. Benson and FL, Coxcomb, IV. 2.

curser (kərs'ər), n. One who curses or utters a curse.

Thy Curser, Jacob, shall twice curse be;
And he shall bless himself that blesses thee. Cowley, Davidides, I.

cursor (kərs'ər), n. [ML. cursor, equiv. to L. cursor, a runner, < currere, run: see currere.] 1. Formerly, in England, one of twenty-four officers or clerks in the Court of Chancery, also called clerks of the course, whose business it was to make out original writs, each for the county to which he was assigned.

Then is the recognition and value . . . carried by the cursor in Chancery for that shire where those lands do lie. Bacon.

2. A courier or runner.

Cursors to and fro. Holland, tr. of Ammianus Marcellinus.

Curator baron, an officer who administered oaths to sheriffs, bailiffs, functionaries of the customs, etc.

Cursor (kərs'ər), n. [NL., pl. of ML. cursor, a runner: see cursor.] In Macgillivray's system of classification, an order of birds, the runners, exemplified by the plovers.

curative (kərs'iv), a. and n. [= F. curatif = Sp. Pg. curativo = It. curativo, < ML. curativus, running (of writing), < L. curare, a running, a course, < currere, run: see currere.] I. a. Running; flowing, as writing or manuscript in which the letters are joined one to another, and are formed rapidly without raising the pen, pencil, or stylus; specifically, in paleography, modified from the capital or uncial form, so as to assume a form analogous to that used in modern running hand: as, the curative style; curative letters; curative manuscripts. Greek curative writing is found in papyri dating back to about 180 B.C., at first very similar to the lapidary and uncial characters of the same period, but gradually becoming more rounded in form and negligent in style. The cursive curative is, however, most frequently applied to the later cursive or minuscule writing from the ninth century on. (See minuscule.) The beginning of a Latin curative character is seen in some second tablet discovered in 1875 in the house of L. Caelius Iulianus at Pompeii. Forms similar to these also occur in the dipinti and graffiti (characters painted on or incised in walls, vases, etc.) of the same place or period. The ancient Latin curative character known to us in manuscript from the fourth century on is, however, considerably different from this. In medieval manuscripts the curative hand was employed from the Merovingian epoch, often in combination with the other contemporary styles; but from the ninth century it was replaced for all careful work by the so-called Carolingian and Gothic characters, and continued in use up to the invention of printing only in degenerated form and for writings of small importance or hasty execution (See manuscript.)

In the earliest examples of curative writing we find the uncial character in use, and, as has been already remarked, many of the specimens fluctuate between the more formal or set book-hand and the curative.

Encyc. Brit., XVIII. 149.

II. n. 1. A curative letter or character: as, a manuscript written in curative.

The old Roman curative, the existence and nature of which is thus established, is, as we shall presently see, of immense historical importance in explaining the origin of modern scripts, several of our own minuscule letters being actually traceable to the Pompeian forms. Isaac Taylor, The Alphabet, II. 109.

2. A manuscript written in curative characters.

After a brief description of the Septuagint manuscripts which contain Reskeli—four uncials, with a fragment of a fifth, and twenty-five curative. I. F. Noor, Andover Rev., VII. 95.

When day, expiring in the west,
The curtain draws o' nature's rest.
Burns, Dainty Davie.

3. One of the movable pieces of canvas or other material forming a tent.

Thou shalt make the tabernacle with ten curtains of fine twisted linen. . . . And thou shalt make curtains of goats' hair to be a covering upon the tabernacle.

Ex. xxvi. 1, 7.

I saw the tents of Cushan in affliction: and the curtains of the land of Midian did tremble.
Hab. iii. 7.

4. In fort., that part of a rampart which is between the flanks of two bastions or between two towers or gates, and bordered with a parapet, behind which the soldiers stand to fire on the covered way and into the moat. See cuts under bastion and crown-work.

A rowling Tower against the Town doth rear,
And on the top (or highest stage) of it
A flying Bridge, to reach the Courtin fit,
With pulleys, poles,
Sylvestor, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, II., The Decay.

5t. An ensign or flag.

Their ragged curtains poorly are let loose,
And our air shakes them passing scornfully.
Shak., Hen. V., iv. 2.

6. In mycology, same as cortina. — 7. A plate in a lock designed to fall over the keyhole as a mask to prevent tampering with the lock. — 8. The leaden plate which divides into compartments the large leaden chamber in which sulphuric acid is produced by the oxidation of sulphurous compounds in the ordinary process of manufacture. — Behind the curtain, in concealment, in secret. — Complement of the curtain. See complement. — The curtain falls, the scene closes; the play comes to an end.

Truly and beautifully has Scott said of Swift, "the stage darkened ere the curtain fell." Chambers's Encyc. of Lit. The curtain rises, the play or scene opens. — To draw the curtain, to close it by drawing its parts together; hence, to conceal an object; refrain from exhibiting, describing, or descending on something as, we draw the curtain over his failings. — To drop the curtain, to close the scene; end. — To raise the curtain, to open the play or scene; disclose something.

curtain (kér'tān), v. t. [Early mod. E. also cortine, corten; < ME. cortinen, cortynen, curtain; from the noun.] To inclose with or as with curtains; furnish or provide with curtains.

On the French kingly's right hand was another transeer

Hall, Hen. VIII., an. 24.

Nature seems dead, and wicked dreams abuse
The curtain'd sleep.
Shak., Macbeth, II. 1.

Whose eye lids curtain'd up their jewels dim Keats, Endymion, I.

As the smile of the sun breaks through 'Till gray clouds that curtain the blue.
Bryant, Song Sparrow.

curtain-angle (kér'tān-ang'gl), n. The angle included between the flank and the curtain of a fortification. See cut under bastion.

curtain-lecture (kér'tān-lek'tūr), n. A private admonition or chiding; a lecture or scolding, such as might be given behind the curtains or in bed by a wife to her husband.

What endless brawls by wives are bred!
The curtain lecture makes a mournful bed.
Dryden, tr. of Juvenal's Satires.

She ought, in such cases, to exert the authority of the curtain lecture, and if she finds him of a rebellious disposition, to tame him.
Adison, The Ladies' Association.

curtainless (kér'tān-less), n. [ < curtain + -less.] Without curtain or curtains: as, a curtainless bed.

curtain-of-mail (kér'tān-ov-māl'), n. 1. The camail. — 2. The piece of chain-mail which hangs from the edge of a helmet of the Arabic type, used by Mussulmans throughout the middle ages, and down to a very recent date. See helmet.

curtain-wall (kér'tān-wāl'), n. In fort., a curtain; the wall of a curtain.

Tamworth retains part of the curtain-wall remarkable for its herring-bone masonry.

G. T. Clark, Military Architecture, I. vi.

curtail (kér'tāl), a. and n. [Also written curtail, curtail, curtail, curtail, also courtait (as F.); < OF. courtait, later courtait, adj., short, as n. a curtail, a horse with docked tail (also a horse of a particular size), F. courtait, short, thickset, dumpy, docked, crop-eared (= It. cortado, m., a curtail, a horse with a docked tail, cortakia, f., a short bombard or pot-gun), < court (= It. corto), short (see curt), + -ail, -ait, It. -aldo, E. -ald. By popular etymology, the adj. and noun (now obsolete) as well as the verb have been changed to curtail, q. v.] I. a. Short; cut short; abridged; brief; scant.

A curtaild slipper.

Gosseigne.

Why hast thou marr'd my sword?
The pummel's well, the blade is curtail short.
Greene, Orlando Furioso.

In fruit-time, we had some scure cherries. . . . halfe a pound of figges, and now and then a whole pound, according to the number of those that sat at table, but in that minced and curtail manner that there was none of us so nimble-finger'd that we could come to tye it the second time.
Mabbe, The Rogue (ed. 1623), II. 274.

Matters of this moment, as they were not to be decided there by those Divines, so neither are they to be determin'd heer by Essays and curtail Aphorisms, but by solid proofs of Scripture.
Milton, Rikonoklastes, xliii.

Curtil dog (also written by corruption curtail dog), a dog whose tail was cut off, according to the old English forest-laws, to signify that its owner was hindered from coursing; in later usage, a common dog not meant for sport; a dog that has missed his game.

My curtil dog, that wont to have play'd,
Plays not at all, but seems afraid,
Shak., As You Like It, v. 2.

The curtil dogs, so taught they were,
They kept the arrows in their mouth.

Robin Hood and the Curtil Fryer (Child's Ballads, V. 277).

Curtil friar, apparently, a friar wearing a short gown or habit.

Robin Hood lighted off his horse,
And tyed him to a thorne;
Carry me over the water, thou curtil fryer,
Or else thy life's forlorn.

Robin Hood and the Curtil Fryer (Child's Ballads, V. 278).

Who hath seen our chaplain? Where is our curtil-friar?
Scott, Ivanhoe, xxvii.

II. n. 1. A horse or dog with a docked tail: hence applied to a person mutilated in any way.

I am made a curtail; for the pillory hath eaten off both my ears.
Greene.

I'd give my Curtail, and his furniture,
My mouth no more were broken than these boys'.
Shak., All's Well, II. 3.

And because I feared he would lay claim to my sorry curtail in my stable, I ran to the smith to have him set on his mane again and his tail presently, that the commission-man might not think him a curtail.

Chapman, Gentleman Usher, I. 1.

2. A short cannon. — 3. A musical instrument of the bassoon kind. Also written curtail, courtel, cortail, cortand, courtant.

I knew him by his hoarse voice, which sounded like the lowest note of a double curtail.

Tom Brown, Works (ed. 1760), II. 182 curtail (kér'tāl), v. t. [ < curt + -ail. Now curtail, q. v.] To cut short; curtail.

curtail-axe, curtail-axe, n. [Also written curtail, also curtelax, curtelax, curtelax, curtelax, etc., corrupt forms, simulating curtail, short, and ax (apparently by association with battle-axe), of outlas, cut-lace: see outlas.] A outlas (which see).

But speare and curtail both und Piermond in field.
Spenser, F. Q., IV. II. 42.

A gallant curtail-axe upon my thigh.
Shak., As You Like It, I. 3.

Therewith springs the shrub three foot above the grass,
Which loath, the leaven edge of the curtail.
Neville, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, I., Eden curtaild, curtailt, a. and n. See curtail.

curtana, n. See curtail.

curtasy, n. An obsolete form of courtesy.

curtate (kér'tāt), a. [ < L. curtatus, pp. of curtare, shorten, < curtus, shortened: see curt.] Shortened; reduced. — Curtate cycloid. See cycloid, 1. — Curtate distance of a planet, in astron., the distance between the sun or earth and that point where a perpendicular let fall from the planet meets the plane of the ellipse.

curtation (kér-tā'shon), n. [ < NL. *curtatio(n), < L. curtare, pp. curtatus, shorten: see curtail.] In astron., the difference between a planet's true distance from the sun and its curtate distance.

curtain, curtana (kér-tān', -tā'ng), n. [AF. curtein, OF. curtain, curtain, ML. curtana, < L. curtus, broken, shortened: see curt. The name was orig. applied to the sword of Roland, of which, according to the tradition, the point was broken off in testing it.] The pointless sword carried before the kings of England at their coronation, and emblematically considered as the sword of mercy. It is also called the sword of Edward the Confessor.

Hommage denied, to renounce you proceed;
But when Curtana will not do the deed,
You lay that pointless clergy-weapon by,
And to the laws, your sword of justice, fly.
Dryden, Hind and Panther, II. 419.

curtail, a. A Middle English form of courteous.

curtelax, n. Same as kirtle.

curtelax, curtelaxet, n. Same as curtail-axe for cutlas.

curtesy, n. See courtesy.

curtilage (kér'ti-lāj), n. [ < OF. cortillage, curtilage, curtilage, courtillage, < cortil, cortil, cur-til, a courtyard, < L. cors (cort-), ML. also cortis, a court: see court, n.] In law, the area of land occupied by a dwelling and its yard and outbuildings, and inclosed, or deemed as if inclosed, for their better use and enjoyment. At common law, breaking into an outbuilding is not technically housebreaking unless it is within the curtilage.

curtinet, n. An obsolete spelling of curtain.

curtilax, curtil-axe, n. See curtail-axe.

curtly (kér'tli), adv. In a curt manner. (a) Briefly; shortly.

Here Mr. Lloentiat shew'd his art; and hath so curtly, succinctly, and concisely epitomiz'd the long story of the captive.

Gayton, Notes on Don Quixote, IV. 15

(b) In a short and dry utterance; abruptly.

curtness (kér't'ness), n. Shortness; conciseness; tart abruptness, as of manner.

The sense must be curtailed and broken into parts, to make it square with the curtness of the melody.

Kames, Elem. of Criticism.

curtolt, curtoldt, curtollt, a. and n. See curtail.

curtay (kér'tsi), n. [Also written curtay, curtsey; another form of courtesy.] Same as courtesy, 3.

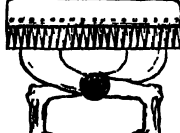

curtay (kér'tsi), v.; pret. and pp. curtayed, ppr. curtaying. Same as courtesy.

curuba (kér'rub-), n. [Corruption of native culupa.] The sweet calabash of the Antilles, the fruit of Passiflora maliformis.

curucul (kér'ruk-wi), n. [Braz.; prob. imitative.] The Brazilian name of a bird, the Trogon curucul (Linnaeus). In the form Curucucus it was made by Bonaparte in 1854 the generic name of the group of trogons to which the curucul pertains.

curule (kér'ül), n. [= F. curule = Sp. Fg. curul = It. curule, < L. curulis, prob. for curulus (sometimes so written), of or pertaining to a chariot (or to the sella curulis, the curule chair), < curvus (curru-), a chariot, < currere, run, race: see current, curvule.] 1. Pertaining or belonging to a chariot. — 2. Privileged to sit in a curule chair: as, the curule magistrates. — Curule chair or seat, among the Romans, the chair of state, the right to sit in which was reserved under the republic to consuls, pretors, curule ediles, censors, the flamen dialis, and the dictator and his deputies, when in office — all, hence, styled curule magistrates. Under the empire it was assumed by the emperor, and was granted to the priests of the imperial house, and perhaps to the prefect of the city. In form it long resembled a plain folding seat with curved legs and no back, but is described as incrustated with ivory, &c.; and later it was ornamented in accordance with the prevalent taste for luxury.

Curule chair, from drawing found in Pompeii

There are remains at Lucca of an amphitheatre; . . . and in the town-house there is a fine relief of a curule chair.

Pococke, Description of the East, II. II. 208.

curulet, n. [Appar. a mistake for curvillet.] A sort of plover. Crabb.

curval (kér'val), a. [ < curve + -al.] In her, same as curvant.

curvant (kér'vant), a. [ < curve + -ant.] In her., curved or bowed.

curvate, curvated (kér'vāt, -vāt-ed), a. [ < L. curvatus, pp. of currare, make crooked or curved, < curvus, curved: see curvi, a.] Curved; bent in a regular form.

curvation (kér-vā'shon), n. [ < L. curvatio(n-), < currare, pp. curvatus, bend, curve: see curve, r.] The act of bending or curving.

curvative (kér-vā-tiv), a. [ < L. curvatus, pp. of currare, make crooked or curved, < curvus, curved: see curvi, a.] Curved; bent in a regular form.

curved (see curvate), + -er.] In bot., having the leaves slightly curved. [Rare.]

curvature (kér-vā-tūr), n. [= Sp. It. curvatura = Pg. curvadura, < L. curvatura, < currare, pp. curvatus, bend, curve: see curve, r.] 1. Continuous bending; the essential character of a curve: applied primarily to lines, but also to surfaces. See phrases below.

In a curve, the curvature is the angle through which the tangent sweeps round per unit of length of the curve.

A. Daniell, Prin. of Physic, p. 74.

2. Any curving or bending; a flexure. — 3. Something which is curved or bent. Aberrancy of curvature. See aberrancy. — Absolute curvature of a twisted curve, in geom., the reciprocal of the radius of the osculating circle. — Angle of curvature. See angle. — Angular curvature of the spine, in pathol., abnormal and excessive curvature of the spine projecting backward, produced by caries of the bodies of the vertebrae, or Pott's disease. Also called Pott's curvature. — Anticlastic curvature, in geom., that kind of curvature which belongs to a surface cutting its tangent plane in four real directions, as the inside part of an anchor-ring. Anticlastic curvature is also called hyperbolic curvature, because a surface so curved has a hyperbola for its indicatrix. — Average curvature, the whole curvature divided by the length of the curve or the area of the surface.

Center of curvature, of principal curvature, of spherical curvature. See center. — Chord of curvature. See chord. — Circle of curvature. See circle. — Curvature of concavation, in bot., curvature in a growing internode which follows upon a sharp blow, the curvature being concave on the side which receives the stroke. A phrase derived from saccha. — Curve of curvature. See curve. — Curve of double curvature. See curve. — Darwinian curvature, the curvature observed by Darwin as occurring in roots in response to stimulation. It is peculiar in being convex on the side to which the stimulus is applied. — Double curvature, a term applied to the curvature of a line which twists, so that all the parts of it do not lie in the same plane, as the rhumb line of loxodromic curve. — Geodesic curvature, the ratio of the angle between two successive geodesic tangents to a curve drawn upon a curved surface to the length of the infinitesimal arc between those tangents. — Hyperbolic curvature. See antiscalar curvature. — Indeterminate curvature, the curvature of a curve or surface at a node, where the usual expression for the curvature becomes indeterminate. — Integral curvature. See aboli curvature. — Lateral curvature of the spine, in pathol., abnormal curvature of the spinal column in a lateral direction caused by a relaxation of the ligaments and muscles which normally keep the spine erect. Also called scolliosis. — Line of curvature, in geom., a curve traced upon a surface so as to lie constantly in the plane of the section of maximum or of minimum curvature at the point of the surface. — Measure of curvature, any point of a curve or surface; the average curvature in the immediate neighborhood of that point. Also simply curvature. — Pott's curvature. Same as angular curvature of the spine. — Radius of curvature, the radius of the circle of curvature. — Second curvature, torsion, the rate of rotation of the osculating plane of a curve, relatively to the increment of the arc. — Spherical curvature of a twisted curve. (a) The reciprocal of the radius of the osculating sphere. (b) Plane curvature existing in any part of a twisted curve; that kind of curvature which exists at any part of a surface where the osculating quadric surface reduces to a sphere. — Synclastic curvature, that kind of curvature which belongs to a surface not cutting its tangent plane in a real locus. — Whole, total, or integral curvature, the angle between the normals at the extremities of an arc of a plane curve; as applied to a portion of a surface, the area on the surface of a unit-sphere described by a radius which moves parallel to the normal to the contour of the portion of surface whose curvature is spoken of; as applied to an arc of a twisted curve, the length of the curve described on the surface of a unit-sphere by a radius moving parallel to the normal to the curve.

curve (kérv), a. and n. [In earlier use curb, < M.E. courbe, < OF. courbe, corbe (see curb), F. courbe = Pr. corb = Sp. Pg. Ir. curro, < L. curvus, bent, curved, = O.Bulg. krivŭ, bent, = Lith. kreiva, crooked, akin to Gr. κνρός, bent, and prob. to κνρος, κνρος, L. curvus, a ring, circle; see curlic.] I. a. Bending; crooked; curved.

A curved line is that which is neither a straight line nor composed of straight lines. Ogilvie.

II. n. 1. A continuous bending; a flexure without angles; usually, as a concrete noun, a one-way geometrical locus which may be conceived as described by a point moving along a line round which as axis turns a plane, while the line rotates in the plane round the point. The curve is at the same time the envelop of the plane and of the line. Geometers understand a curve as something capable of being defined by an equation or equations, or otherwise described in general terms. It may thus have nodes, cusps, and other singularities, but must not be broken in a way which cannot be precisely defined without the use of special numbers. Curves are often employed in physics and statistics to represent graphically the changes in value of certain physical or statistical quantities: as, the energy curve of the solar spectrum; the isothermal line or curve; the curve of population.

Not pastoral rivulet that swerves

2. Anything continuously bent. — 3. A draftsman's instrument for forming curved figures.

— 4. In base-ball, the course of a ball so pitched that it does not pass in a straight line from the pitcher to the catcher, but makes a deflection in the air other than the ordinary one caused by the force of gravity; as, it was difficult to gage the curves of the pitcher. An in curve is one that deflects from the straight line toward the batter, an out curve, away from the batter. A drop deflects downward, and a rise or up curve upward.

— Adiabatic curve. See adiabatic. — Algebraic curve, a curve whose equations in linear coordinates contain only algebraic functions of the coordinates. — Anelastic curves, anelastic curves. See elastic. — Anticlastic and synclastic curves, in geom., terms applied to the elevations and depressions of undulating surfaces of strata. See anticlastic and synclastic. — Asymptotical curves. See asymptotical. — Axis of a curve. See axis. — Bi-cursal curve, a curve which cannot be described by the continuous motion of one point, even if it passes through infinity, but can be so described by two points. — Bipartite curve, bitangent curve. See the adjectives. — Cartesian curve. Name of a Cartesian, n. 2. — Catenary or catenarian curve. See catenary. — Caulic curve. Name of a caulic, n. 3. — Center of a curve. See center. — Characteristic angle of a curve. See characteristic. — Class of a curve. See class. — Closed curve. See closed. — Contact of two curves. See contact. — Cubic curve, a curve of the third order, cutting every plane (or else every line in the plane) in three points. A cubic curve in a plane is one which is cut by every line in the plane in three points, real or imaginary. Such curves are of three genera: nodal cubics, which have either a crunode or an acnode; cuspidal cubics, which have a cusp; and non-singular cubics, which are bicursal, though one branch may be imaginary. — Curve coordinates. See coordinates. — Curve of beauty, a gentle curve of double or contrary flexure, in which it has been sought to trace the foundation of all beauty of form. Also called line of beauty. — Curve of curvature, a curve drawn upon a surface in such a manner that at every point normals to the surface at consecutive points of the curve intersect one another. — Curve of double curvature, a curve not contained in one plane. — Curve of elastic resistance, in gunn., a curve whose ordinates give the elastic resistance of a built up gun at the different points along the bore. — Curve of equal or equable approach. See approach. — Curve of probability, a curve whose equation is representing the probabilities of different numbers of recurrences of an event. — Curve of pursuit, the curve described by a point representing a dog which runs with constant velocity toward another point representing a hare, this second point also moving, generally in a straight line, with constant velocity. After the dog passes the hare, he runs away from it according to the same law.

— Curve of sines, cosines, tangents, secants, etc., curves in which the abscissa is proportional to the angle and the ordinate to a trigonometric function of the angle. — Cuspidal curve, a cusp, on a surface along which the surface so touches itself that on cutting the surface by an arbitrary plane at every intersection of this plane with the cuspidal curve the intersection of the plane with the surface has a cusp. — Deficiency of an algebraical curve, the number by which the number of its double points—nodes and cusps—falls short of the highest number which a curve of the same order can have. — Dianodal curve. See dianodal. — Distribution of a curve, in geom., twice the number of double points increased by three times the number of cusps. — Elastic curve, the figure assumed by a thin elastic plate acted upon by a force and a couple. — Equation to a curve. See equation. — Equitangent curve, a curve upon whose tangents a fixed line (called the directrix) intercepts equal distances from the points of tangency. — Exponential curve. See exponential. — Family of curves, a singly infinite series of curves differing from one another only by the different values assumed by one constant. — Flexure of a curve, in math., the bending of the curve toward or from a straight line. — Foliate curve, the locus of foci of a surface. — Foliate curve, Newton's class of cubic curves, a plane cubic having a crunode and a point of inflection at infinity, the inflectional tangent being an ordinary line. It is supposed to resemble a leaf. For a figure, see class. — Geodesic curve. See geodesic. — Geometric curve. See geometric. — Harmonic curve, a curve whose ordinates are a simple harmonic function of the abscissas, a curve of sines. — Lemniscatic curve, a plane curve whose polar equation is of the form  $r^2 = A \sin \theta$ . — Lissajous's curves (so named from the French physicist Jules Antoine Lissajous, who observed them first in 1857), figures produced by the composition of two simple harmonic motions, as the curve formed on a screen by a ray of light reflected first from a mirror attached to one vibrating tuning-fork, and then from a mirror on another fork which is placed, for example, at right angles to the first. The form of the curve traced out by the point of light depends upon the difference of pitch between the two forks, and also upon the difference of phase. — Loxodromic curve. See loxodromic. — Magnetic curves. See magnetic. — Mechanical curve, a curve of such a nature that the relation between the abscissa and the ordinate cannot be expressed by an algebraic equation. Such curves are now generally called transcendental curves, opposed to algebraic curves. — Order of an algebraic curve, the number of points, real or imaginary, in which it cuts every plane (or every line in that plane). — Organic description of curves, in geom., the description of curves on a plane by means of instruments. — Periodic curve, a curve which represents a periodic function. — Plane curve, a curve lying in a plane. — Quartic curve, a curve of the fourth order. — Radical curve, a spiral having several branches through the origin. — Range curve, a curve employed to determine the approximate ranges for different angles of elevation of a projectile fired from a given point with a given charge of powder. It is constructed by tracing a line through the points of intersection of the ordinates and abscissas representing respectively the time of elevation given and the corresponding ranges obtained from practice. It gives a rapid method for interpolating intermediate ranges. The tabulation of these elevations with their corresponding ranges taken from the curve constitutes a range table. — Rank of a curve. See rank. — Sextic curve, a curve of the sixth order. — Skew, twisted, or tortuous curve, a curve not lying in a plane. — Transcendental curve, a curve whose equation contains transcendental functions of one or more of the coordinates. — Twisted cubic curve. Same as twisted cube (which see, under cube, n.).

curve (kérv), v.; pret. and pp. curved, ppr. curving. [In earlier use curb (now with deflected senses: see curb, n.), < OF. curber, corber, curber, curber = Pr. corbar = OSp. corrar (Sp. encorrar) = Pg. currar = It. currare, corrar, < L. currare, bend, curve, < currus, bent, curved; see curve, a.] I. trans. To bend; cause to take the shape of a curve; crook; inflect.

And homine Vivien . . .

Tennyson, Merlin and Vivien.

Brunelleschi curved the dome which Michel Angelo hung in air on St. Peter's.

Longfellow, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 2

II. intrans. To have or assume a curved or flexed form; as, to curve inward.

Out again I curve and flow. Tennyson, The Brook.

Through the dewy meadow's breast, fringed with shade, but touched on one side with the sun-smile, ran the crystal river, curving in its brightness, like diverted hope. R. D. Blackmore, Lorna Doone, xxxiii.

curvedness (kér'ved-nēs), n. The state of being curved. [Rare.]

curvet (kér'vet or kër'vet'), n. [Formerly curret, < It. corvetta (= F. courbette), a curvet, leap, bound, < currare, curraro, bow, bend, stoop, < L. currare, bend, curve; see curve, v.] 1. In the manège, a leap of a horse in which both the fore legs are raised at once and equally advanced, the haunches lowered, and the hind legs brought forward, the horse springing as the fore legs are falling, so that all his legs are in the air at once.

The bound and high curvet

curvicaudate (kér-vi-ká'dāt), a. [< L. curvus, curved, + cauda, tail; see caudate.] Having a curved or crooked tail.

curvicostrate (kér-vi-kos'trāt), a. [< L. curvus, curved, + costa, a rib; see costate.] Having small curved ribs.

curvidentate (kér-vi-den'tāt), a. [< L. curvus, curved, + dent (= n.) = F. dent; see dentate.] Having curved teeth.

curvifoliate (kér-vi-fó-li-āt), a. [< L. curvus, curved, + folium, a leaf; see foliate.] Having curved leaves.

curviform (kér-vi-fórm), a. [< L. curvus, curved, + forma, shape.] Having a curved form.

curvilinear (kér-vi-lín-ĕ-āl), n. [An curvilinear or ad.] An instrument for delineating curves.

curvilinear (kér-vi-lín-ĕ-āl), a. [Also curvilinear (after linear, linear); cf. F. curviligne = Sp. Pg. It. curvilineo; < L. curvus, bent, + linea, line; see line.] Having a curved line; consisting of or bounded by curved lines: as, a curvilinear figure. Curvilinear angle. See angle, 1.

Curvilinear coordinates. See coordinate.

curvilinearly (kér-vi-lín-ĕ-āl-ĭ), n. [< Curvilinear + -ity.] The state of being curvilinear, or of consisting in curved lines.

curvilinearly (kér-vi-lín-ĕ-āl-ĭ), adv. In a curvilinear manner.

curvilinearly (kér-vi-lín-ĕ-āl-ĭ), a. [< L. curvus, curved, + nervus, nerve; see nerve.] Having the veins or nervures curved.

curvilinearly (kér-vi-lín-ĕ-āl-ĭ), a. Same as curvilinearly.

Curvirostra (kér-vi-rós'trā), n. [NL., < L. curvus, curved, + rostrum, a beak.] A genus of birds; the crossbills; synonymous with Loria (which see). Scopoli, 1777. Also called Crossbills.

curvirostral (kér-vi-rós'trāl), a. [< L. curvus, bent, + rostrum, a beak, + -al.] 1. In general, having a decurved bill, as a curlew or crooper. — 2. Specifically, having a crooked, cruciate bill, as the crossbills; metanathous. See cut under crossbill.

Curvirostris (kér-vi-rós'trés), n. pl. [NL., < L. curvus, curved, + rostrum, a beak.] In ornith., a group of laminiplanter oesine Passeres, nearly the same as the Certhiomorpha of Sundevall. Solator, 1880.

curviserial (kér-vi-sē-ri-āl), a. [< L. curvus, curved, + series, series, + -al.] Arranged in curved or spiral ranks: in bot., applied by Bravais to a theoretical form of leaf-arrangement in which the angle of divergence is incommensurable with the circumference, and consequently no leaf can be exactly above any preceding one. The ordinary forms of phyllotaxy indicated by the fractions  $\frac{1}{2}$ ,  $\frac{2}{3}$ , etc., approximate more and more closely to this, and the deviation in the  $\frac{1}{2}$  and  $\frac{2}{3}$  arrangements is inappreciable. Such forms, therefore, are sometimes so designated.

curvital (kér-vi-tál), a. [curve + -it- + -al.]

Pertaining to curves in general.—Curvital function, a function expressing the length of the perpendicular from a fixed point of a curve upon a normal at a variable point, the length of the arc from the fixed to the variable point being the independent variable of the function.

curvograph (kér-vô-gráf), n. [L. curvus, curved, & Gr. γράφω, write.] An arcograph.

curvons (kér-vun), a. [L. curvus, curved: see curve, a.] Bent; crooked; curved. Colas, 1717.

curvulate (kér-vû-lât), a. [*NL. *curvulus*, dim. of L. curvus, curved, + -ate.] Slightly curved.

curwillet (kér-wil'et), n. [Origin obscure.]

The wandering, Calidris arenaria. Montagu.

cury, n. [ME. cury, var. of cure, < L. cura, care: see cure, n.] Art; device; invention.

Cookes with their new concytes . . . Many new curies alle day they are contrivynge and fyndynge. Babes Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 149.

Cusco bark. See *bark*².

Cusco china. Same as Cusco bark (which see, under *bark*²).

cusco-cinchonin (kus'kô-nin'kô-nin), n. Same as cinchonin.

cusconidine (kus-kon'i-din), n. [Cusco(n) (bark) + -id + -ine.] An alkaloid of cinchona.

cusconine (kus'kô-nin), n. [Cusco(n) (bark) + -ine.] An alkaloid (C<sub>22</sub>H<sub>29</sub>N<sub>3</sub>O<sub>4</sub> + 2H<sub>2</sub>O) of cinchona. Also cusco-cinchonin.

Cuscus¹ (kus'kus), n. [NL., of native origin.] A genus of marsupial quadrupeds of the Australian and Papuan islands, including opossum-like prehensile-tailed phalangers, covered with dense woolly fur, having a small head and large eyes, living in trees, and characterized by slow movements. Their average size is about that of a domestic cat. There are several species, as C. ursinus, C. orientalis, C. maculatus, and C. reevesi, the last inhabiting New Guinea.

cuscus² (kus'kus), n. [E. Ind. khukhus.] The commercial name for the long fibrous aromatic root of cuscus-grass, which is used for making tatties or screens, ornamental baskets, etc.

cuscus-grass (kus'kus-grás), n. An aromatic grass of India, Andropogon muricatus. See Andropogon and tattie.

Dioder (Cuscus).

Cuscuta (kus-ká'tá), n. [NL., from the Ar. name.] A genus of parasitic plants, natural order Convolvulaceae; the dodders. They are slender, leafless, yellow or orange-colored twining plants, drawing their nourishment wholly from the herbaceous plants to which they fasten. The flowers are white and the embryo is without cotyledons. There are about 80 species, widely distributed, some of them noxious weeds, as C. Epithimum and C. Trifolii, which are very injurious in fields of flax and clover. See dodder.

cush (kush), n. [Anglo-Ind.] The commercial name in India for sorghum.

cushat (kush'at), n. [E. dial. also cushat, con-shot, conshut, consoot, Sc. also lowshot, also cushio (cushie-doe); < ME. consoot, consoot, < AS. cūscot, cūscot, cūscute, a ring-dove, perhaps for **cūscote*, lit. quick-shooting, swift-flying, < cūsc, contr. of cūscen, cūsc, quick, + -scote, < credian, shoot: see shoot, shot.] The ring-dove or wood-pigeon, Columba palumbus.

cushinett, n. See cushionet.

cushion (kush'un), n. [Early mod. E. also cushin, quashon; < ME. cūschone, cūschon, quyashen, cūschun, < OF. cūschun, cūschin, cūschin, cūschin, F. cūschin = Pr. cūschin, cūschin = Sp. cūschin, now cūschin = Pg. cūschin = It. cūschino, cūschino = OHG. cūschun, MHG. kūsūn, G. kūsūn, kūsen = MLG. D. kūsūn (cf. Sw. kudda), < ML. cūschinus, cushion, modified, under Rom. influence, from **culcitum*, dim. of L. culcita, a cushion, pillow, feather bed, quilt: see counterpoint and quilt.] 1. A bag-like case of cloth or leather, usually of moderate size, filled with feathers, wool, or other soft material, used to support or ease some part of the body in sitting or reclining, as on a chair or lounge. See pillow.

I upon which type of sitting, the servitors moote diligently a-way to wate the use of quashons.

Babes Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 380.

In a shadowy saloon,
On silken cushions half reclined.

Tennyson, Eleonore

2. Something resembling a cushion in structure, softness, elasticity, use, or appearance; especially, something used to counteract a sudden shock, jar, or jolt, as in a piece of mechanism. Specifically: (a) An elastic pad of alkalin stuffed with wool, on which gold leaf is placed and cut with a palette-knife into the forms or sizes needed by the finisher for the gilding of books. Also called gold-cushion. (b) A pillow used in lace making. See pillow. (c) A pincushion (which see). (d) In hair dressing, a pad used for supporting the hair and increasing its apparent mass.

The hair was arranged [in 1789] over a cushion formed of wool, and covered with silk.

Fairholt, Costume, II. 211.

(e) The rubber of an electrical machine. See rubber. (f) The padded side or rim of a billiard table. (g) The head of a bit-stock. See braces, 14. (h) In mach., a body of air or steam which moves, under pressure, as an elastic check or buffer, specifically, steam left in the cylinder of an engine to arrive as an elastic check for the piston. The cushion is made by closing the exhaust-outlet an instant before the end of the stroke, or by opening the inlet for live steam before the stroke is finished. (i) In zool., a pulvillus. (j) In bot., the enlargement at or beneath the insertion of many leaves, a special mobile organ. Also called pulvinus. (k) In arch., the echinus of a capital.

3. The woolsack.

[Chief Justice Hale] became the cushion exceedingly well.

Roper North, Lord Gifford, I. 144.

Cushion style, in embroidery, formerly, the simplest stitch, like modern Berlin work or worsted work, so called because much used for cushions to kneel upon in church, etc. To be beside the cushion, to miss the mark (literally or figuratively). Nares.—To hit or miss the cushion, to succeed or fail in an attempt; hit or miss a mark. Nares.

cushion (kush'un), v. [Cushion, n.] 1. trans. 1. To seat on or as on a cushion or cushions.

Many, who are cushioned upon thrones, would have remained in obscurity.

Bulwer-Luttrell, Parties

2. To cover or conceal with or as with a cushion; furnish with a cushion or cushions, in any sense of that word: as, to cushion a seat; to cushion a carriage.

Further gain was also made by cushioning the bearings of the diaphragm on both sides with rings of paper.

G. B. Prescott, Elect. Invent., p. 24

3. To put aside or suppress.

The apothecary trotted into town, now in full possession of the vicar's motives for desiring to cushion his son's oratory.

W. M. Baugess, R. Medlicott, II. 10.

cushion-capital (kush'un-kap'i-tál), n. In arch., a capital of such form as to appear like a cushion pressed upon by the weight of the entablature. It is of common occurrence in Indian buildings; and the name is specifically given to a form of Norman capital, consisting of a cubic round ed off at its lower angles.

Cushion-capital (Norman)

cushion-carom (kush'un-qm), n. In billiards, a carom in which the cue-ball hits the cushion before striking the second object-ball.

cushion-dance (kush'un-dans), n. An English and Scotch dance, especially popular among country people and at weddings. It is a sort of circular gallopade in single file, in which, at a certain regularly recurring stage in the music, each dancer in turn drops a cushion before one of the other sex, the two having knelt and kissed each other, the promenade is resumed. In Scotland it is called bab at the bow-stick, or bob at the bolster.

cushionet (kush'un-et), n. [Formerly also cushinet (= It. cuscinetto); as cushion + dim. -et.] A little cushion.

cushioning (kush'un-ing), n. [Cushion + -ing.] The act of providing with a cushion; a provision of cushions; in mach., the effect produced by a cushion; a cushion or buffer.

If the small quantity [of air] necessary to supply the motor be confined, it will also be able to provide all the cushioning that is desirable. Sci. Amer. Supp., p. 802.

Preadmission, that is to say, admission before the end of the back stroke, which, together with the compression of steam left in the cylinder when the exhaust port closes, produces the mechanical effect of cushioning.

Engin. Div., XXII. 501.

cushion-rafter (kush'un-ráf'tér), n. An auxiliary rafter placed beneath a principal one, to relieve an unusual strain.

cushion-scale (kush'un-skál), n. A very common scale-insect, Icerya purchasi, injurious to the orange and other fruits cultivated in California: so called from the large cushion-like, waxy, fluted ovicase attached to the bodies of the females. It is very active and hardy, is capable of being transported from one continent to another, infests many different cultivated trees and plants, and is a great pest. The female bug has three molts and the male two. Also called cottony cushion-scale, and also white scale, fluted scale, and Australian bug.

cushion-star (kush'un-stár), n. A kind of starfish of the genus Comaster and family Asteriidae. G. equestris, the knotty cushion-star, is a British species.

cushion-stitch (kush'un-stich), n. In embroidery, a stitch by which the ground is covered with straight short lines formed by repeated short stitches. This stitch was much used to form the background of elaborate embroidery in the fifteenth and later centuries, sometimes imitating painting, the colors being mingled with great ingenuity so as to represent clouds, distant foliage, etc.

cushiony (kush'un-i), a. [Cushion + -y.] Like a cushion; soft and yielding or elastic.

A bow legged character with a flat and cushiony nose. Dickens, Uncommercial Traveller, x.

It was this turf and grassy character of these mountains I am tempted to say their cushiony character—that no reading or picture viewing of mine had prepared me for.

nence or protuberance of the crown of a tooth.
A blunt conical cusp is called a tubercle, a sharp ac-tural cusp is a blade a low or lateral cusp is a heel.
Teeth are sometimes named from the number of their cusps, as bicuspid, tricuspid. A canine tooth the crown of which consists of a single cusp, is caninoid. (b) A sharp tooth-like process on a margin or part.
—6. In bot., a sharp and rigid point, as of a leaf.—Cusp of the second kind, in geom., a ramphoid cusp. See first figure, def. 1.—Deciduous cusps. See deciduous.

Cusparia bark. See bark.
cusparia (kus'pa-rin), n. [Cusparia (see def.) + -ia] An azo-anized crystallizable substance obtained from the bark of the true angustura, Galipes Cusparia. It is soluble in alcohol, and slightly so in water.
cuspidate (kus'pi-ted), a. [Cusp + -ate + -ed.
OF. cuspidatus] Ending in a cusp or point; pointed; cuspidated.

cusped (kusp't), a. [Cusp + -ed.] Furnished with a cusp; cusp-shaped.
cuspidal (kus'pi-dal), a. [L. cuspid (cuspid-), a point, + -al.] 1. Ending in a point.—2. In geom., having a cusp; relating to a cusp.—Cuspi- dally, a plane which curve having a cusp. Such curves are of the third class, and have only one point of inflection and no node.—Cuspidal curve. See curve.
—Cuspidal edge, of a developable surface, the locus of points where successive generators of the surface intersect. Also called edge of regression.—Cuspidal locus, the locus of cusps of a family of curves.

Cuspidaria (kus-pi-dā'ri-ā), n. [NL., < L. cuspid (cuspid-), a point, + -aria.] A genus of bivalves, typical of the family Cuspidaridae.
Also called Navra.

Cuspidaridae (kus-pi-dā'ri-dā), n. pl. [NL., <
Cuspidaria + -idae] A family of bivalves with single branches on each side very little developed or wanting, palpi also wanting, and with an inequivalve shell having a calcareous oset-let in each valve and posterior lateral teeth.
They are of small size, and inhabit almost all

See brilliant.—Cut over point, in swinging, a passing of the point of the weapon over that of the adversary in thrusting upon him.

Holando (ed. Forst.).—Degree cut. Same as trap cut.—Dental cut, in gem-cutting, a style of ornamentation consisting of two rows of facets on the top of the stone.—Rose cut, in gem-cutting, a form of ornamentation in which the upper part of the stone has 24 triangular facets, and the back of the stone is flat. When the base is a duplicate of the upper side, the stone becomes a double rose.

Rose-cut diamonds are usually set with foil at the back. See brilliant, fig. 7.—Star cut, in diamond-cutting, a form of brilliant-cutting in which the facets on the top and back are so arranged that they resemble a star.—Sleep cut. Same as trap cut.—Table cut, in diamond-cutting, a form of ornamentation in which the stone is usually flat, and cut with long (technically called table) facets with beveled edges, or a border of small facets.—The cut of one's jib, the shape or general appearance of a person: as, I knew him by the cut of his jib. (Originally a sailors' phrase with reference to the characteristic form of a ship's jib.)

The young ladies liked to appear in nautical and lawn-tennis toilet, carried so far that one might refer to the cut of their jib.

To draw cuts, to draw lots, as of little sticks, straws, papers, etc., cut of unequal lengths.

I think it is best to draw cuts and avoid contention.

J. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 66.

Trap cut, in gem-cutting, a form of ornamentation in which one row or more of long step like facets is arranged on the top or crown of the stone, around the table, and three, six, or more rows of similar steps or degree facets on the back or pavilion; or the top may be brilliant cut, and only the back trap cut, or vice versa. This form of cut intensifies or darkens the color of a stone, and hence is used for the sapphire, emerald, ruby, etc. Also called step cut and degree cut.

cut-against (kut'-a-genst'), n. In bookbinding: (a) The cut made by a bookbinders' knife on cut-heal (kut'hēl), n. [Appar. < cut + heal; from supposed curative properties.] The valerian, Valeriana officinalis.

cuticle (kū'ti-kul), n. [= F. cuticule = Sp. cutícula = Pg. cutícula = It. cuticola, < L. cuticula, dim. of cutis, the skin: see cutis.] 1. In zool. and anat.: (a) The scarf-skin or epidermis; the outermost layer of the skin, forming the general superficial integument or covering of the body (see cut under skin); by extension, any kind of epidermal or cuticular growths, as nails, claws, hoofs, horns, hair, feathers, etc. Veins and skin, and cuticle and nail.

Bentley, Sermons, iii.

(b) The outermost and very superficial integument in general, without reference to its exact nature; a pellicle; a skin, rind, or other investing structure. (c) Some thick, tough membrane lining an internal organ: as, the cuticle of a fowl's gizzard. (d) In infusorians, specifically, the cell-wall.—2. In bot., a continuous hyaline film covering the surface of a plant and formed of the cutinized outer surfaces of the epidermal cells. Sometimes used as equivalent to epidermis.—3. A thin skin formed on the surface of liquor; a film or pellicle.

When any saline liquor is evaporated to cuticle, the salt concretes in regular figures. Newton, Opticks.

cuticula (kū'tik'ū-lā), n.; pl. cuticulæ (-lā). [L., dim. of cutis, the skin: see cutis.] In zool. and anat.: (a) The cuticle proper; the epidermis; the ectoderm; the exoskeleton; the superficial investment of the body, in so far as this is formed by or derived from the epiblastic cells or epiblast of the embryo, whatever its ulterior modification. (b) In infusorians, a comparatively dense envelop to which the outer wall of the body gives rise. Also cuticulum. (c) In annelids, as the earthworm, a thin and transparent tough membrane, forming the outermost envelop of the body, and perforated by extremely minute vertical canals.

cuticular (kū'tik'ū-lār), a. [= F. cuticulaire = Sp. cuticular = It. cuticolare; as cuticula + -ar.] Pertaining to or consisting of cuticle, in a broad sense; epidermal.

The oral and gastric regions are armed with cuticular teeth in many Invertebrata. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 16.

cuticularization (kū'tik'ū-lār-i-sā'shon), n. [< cuticularise + -ation.] Same as cutinization. Also spelled cuticularisation.

cuticularise (kū'tik'ū-lār-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. cuticularised, ppr. cuticularising. [< cuticular + -ise.] To render cuticular; give the character, nature, or composition of the cuticle to. Also cuticularize, cutinise.

The rest of the epidermal cells of the tentacles have their exterior walls excessively cuticularised and resistant. W. Gardiner, Proc. Royal Soc., XXXIX. 220.

A cuticularised cell-wall is almost impermeable to water. Knapp, Brit., XIX. 44.

cuticulum (kū'tik'ū-lum), n. [NL., neut. dim. of L. cutis, skin: see cutis, cuticle.] Same as cuticula (b).

cutification (kū'ti-fī-kā'shon), n. [< cutify: see -fy and -ation.] Formation of epidermis or of skin.

cutify (kū'ti-fi), v. t.; pret. and pp. cutified, ppr. cutifying. [< L. cutis, skin, + -care, make: see cutis and -fy.] To form skin.

cutskins (kū'ti-kins), n. pl. Spatterdaashes. Also written cutthskins. [Scotch.]

cuttin (kū'tin), n. [< L. cutis, the skin, + -in.] According to Frémy, a peculiar modification of cellulose contained in the epidermis of leaves, petals, and fruits, together with ordinary cellulose, and forming the cuticle or cuticular layers. Cuttin exhibits under microscope the aspect of an amorphous p. forated film.

cuttinization (kū'ti-ni-sā'shon), n. [< cuttin + -ation.] In bot., a modification of cell-wall by which they become impermeable to water through the presence of cutin. Also called cuticularization.

cuttine (kū'ti-nī), v. t.; pret. and pp. cuttined, ppr. cuttining. [< cuttin + -in.] Same as cuticularize.

cutis (kū'tis), n. [L., the skin, = *E. hide*², q. v.] 1. The skin in general; a skin.—2. The true skin, corium, or derma underlying the cuticle or scarf-skin. See cut under skin.—3. A firmer tissue of some fungi, forming an outer covering.—Cutis asserina, literally, goose-skin; goose-skin; horripilation; a contracted, roughened state of the skin arising from cold, fright, etc. See asserina.—Cutis vera, the true skin, corium, or derma.

cutticator (kū'ti-sek'g), n. [< L. cutis, skin (see cutis), + sector, a cutter: see sector.] A knife, consisting of a pair of parallel adjustable blades, used for making thin sections in microscopy. E. H. Knight.

Cutiterebra (kū'ti-te-reb'rg), n. [NL. (Clark, 1815), also contr. Cuterebra, < L. cutis, skin, + terebrā, a borer, < terebrō, bore.] A genus of beetles, of the family Cetridæ, the species of which a, side view, natural size; b, anal end, enlarged; c, head end, enlarged.

infest the male genitals of squirrels, rabbits, and other animals. C. emaculator is an example, so called from the effect it produces.

cutitis (kū'ti'tis), n. [< L. cutis, skin, + -itis.] Cytitis. Dunghison.

cutlass, n. See cutlas.

cutlas, outlas (kut'lās), n. [Formerly also cuttolas, cutlass (also courtolas, cuttle-as, and cuttal-as, in simulation of cuttal and cutt), perhaps with some thought of a battle-axe], E. dial. also cutlass; < F. coutelas (= It. coltellaccio, dial. cortelaso, < OF. coutel, cuttel, F. couteau (> E. cutto) = It. coltello, a knife, dagger, < L. cutellus, a knife, dim. of cutis, a knife, > AS. cuter, E. colter, cutter, the knife of a plow, and (through cutellus) E. cutler, q. v. Not connected with cut.] A short sword or large knife, especially one used for cutting rather than thrusting; specifically, a curved basket-hilted sword of strong and simple make, used at sea, especially when boarding or repelling boarders.

cutlas-fish (kut'lās-fish), n. 1. The thread-fish, Trichurus lepturus. See hairtail.—2. A fish of the family Gymnotidae, Carapax fasciatus.

cutlash (kut'lāsh), n. See cutlas.

cutlass, n. See cutlas.

cutler (kut'lēr), n. [< ME. coteler, < AF. coteller, OF. coteller, mod. F. coutelier, < ML. cutellarius, a maker of knives, a soldier armed with a knife, prop. adj., < L. cutellus, a knife, dim. of cutis, a knife: see cutis.] Not connected with cut.] 1. One whose occupation is the making of knives and other cutting instruments.

Like cutler's poetry
Upon a knife, "Love me, and leave me not."
Shak., M. of V., v. 1.

Their cutlers that make hilts are more exquisite in that art than any that I ever saw. Coryat, Crudities, i. 132.

2. One who sharpens or repairs cutlery; a knife-grinder.—Cutler's greenstone. See greenstone. Outleria (kut-lā-rī-g), n. [NL., named after M. Outler, an American botanist (1742-1833).] The representative genus of Outleriaceae. The frond is broad and flat, cut at the margin into narrow segments, as if composed of filaments lying side by side and in some places over one another. Anteridia and spermatia are borne on different fronds, both in groups, some-ing shell-like structure. Each antheridium produces two small reproductive bodies, and each antheridium one large one; both escape as spores, but the female cells soon come to rest, and each assumes the form of an oosphere. C. mellea is a British species.

Cutleriaceae (kut-lér-é-á-sé-é), n. pl. [NL., < Cutleria + -aceae.] A small family of olive-colored algae forming a transition between Phaeosporae and Phaeococci. The genera are Cutleria and Zanardinia.

cutlery (kut-lér-é), n. [Cutler + -y.] 1. The business of a cutler.—2. Edged or cutting instruments collectively.

As absurd to make laws fixing the price of money as to make laws fixing the price of cutlery or of broadcloth. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., xxi.

cutlet (kut-lét), n. [Mod. E., modified in simulation of cut (cf. chop), n., in a similar sense]; = D. Dan. køtlet = G. costoletto = Sw. köttlet, < F. costolette, OF. costellette = Pg. costelleta, a cutlet, lit. a little rib, dim. of coste, OF. coste, etc., < L. costa, a rib: see coast, costa.] A piece of meat, especially veal or mutton, cut horizontally from the upper part of the leg, for broiling or frying.

Mutton cutlets, prime of meat. Swift.

cutling (kut-ling), n. [Verbal n. from **cutle*, assumed from cutler, appar. regarded as cutl-er. Cf. peddle from peddler. Cf. also cuttle.] The art of cutlery. Milton.

cutlins (kut-lins), n. pl. [For **cuttings*, < cut + -ing.] In millling, half-ground fragments of grain.

cut-lips (kut-lips), n. 1. A cyprinoid fish of the subfamily Esoglossinae, Esoglossum maxilligua; a stone-toter.—2. The hare-lipped sucker. [Mississippi valley.] See sucker.

cut-lugged (kut-lugd), a. [So., < cut + lug, the ear, + -ed.] Crop-eared.

cut-mark (kut-märk), n. A mark put upon a set of warp-threads before they are placed on the warp-beam of a loom, to mark off a certain definite length. The mark shows in the woven fabric, and serves as a measure for cutting.

cutmi (kut-mi), n. [Turk. qutmi (kütmi), < Ar. qutn, cotton: see cotton.] A grade of silk and cotton made in the neighborhood of Bursa and elsewhere in Asiatic Turkey, and also in Egypt.

cut-off (kut-óf), n. 1. That which cuts off or shortens, as a short path or cross-cut. Specifically.—2. In steam-engines, a contrivance for cutting off the passage of steam from the steam-chest to the cylinder, when the piston has made a part of its stroke, leaving the rest of the stroke to be accomplished by the expansive force of the steam already in the cylinder. It economizes steam, and thus saves fuel. See governor.—3. A new and shorter channel formed for a river by the waters cutting off or across an angle or bend in its course. Cut-offs, sometimes of great extent, are continually forming in the Mississippi and other western rivers. [U. S.]

A second class [of lakes], large in numbers but small in area, is the result of cut-off and other changes of channel in the Mississippi. Reynolds, Brk., XV, 30.

It occasionally happens that by this constant saving two hands approach each other, until the river cuts the narrow neck of land between them and forms a cut-off, which suddenly and materially reduces its length. Gen. Report on Mississippi River, 1863 (rep. 1876), p. 98.

4. A slide in a delivery-spout in grain-elevators, etc., for shutting off the flow.—5. An arm on a reaper designed to support the falling grain while the platform is being cleared.—6. In plumbing, a connecting pipe.—Adjustable cut-off, a cut-off which can be adjusted to cut off steam at different positions of the piston in the stroke.—Automatic cut-off, a cut-off usually connected with and controlled by the governor of a steam-engine, to cut off steam at any point which will supply the requirements of the engine with reference to its varying duty.—Slider cut-off, a form of cut-off for a steam-valve, consisting of an independent plate sliding upon a track.

cutose (kut-óse), n. [Cutis, skin (see cutis), + -ose.] In bot., a name applied by Frémy to the material composing the hyaline film or cuticle covering the aerial organs of plants.

cut-out (kut-út), n. A kind of switch employed to connect the electric wires passing through a telegraph-instrument, an electric light, etc., and cut out the instrument or the light from the circuit. A safety cut-out usually consists of a fusible wire included in the circuit and mounted upon non-combustible terminals.

cut-pile (kut-pil), n. Having a pile or nap composed of fibers or threads standing erect, produced by shaving the surface so as to cut the loops of thread: said of a textile fabric. The heavier Indian and Levantine rugs, Wilton and Axminster carpets, ordinary velvet, and velveteen are cut-pile goods.

cutpurse (kut-pürs), n. [ME. cutpurse, cutpurs; < cut, v., + obj. purse.] One who cuts purses for the sake of stealing their contents (a practice said to have been common when men wore purses at their girdles); hence, a pickpocket.

A cutpurse of the empire and the rule; That from a shelf the precious diadem stole, And put it in his pocket! Shak., Hamlet, III, 4.

cutra (kut-rä), n. A Turkish weight for indigo, equal to 138 pounds 15 ounces avoirdupois.

cutted (kut-ed), p. a. Obsolete or dialectal past participle of cut. Specifically—(a) Short in speech; curt; laconic.

(b) Sharp in speech; tart; peevish; querulous. She's grown so cutted, there's no speaking to her. Middleton, Women Beware Women, III, 1.

cuttela, n. See cutlas.

cutter (kut-ér), n. [Cut, v., + er, a barber; < cut + -er.] 1. One who cuts or hews; one who shapes or forms anything by cutting.

A skilful cutter of diamonds and polisher of gems. Boyle, Works, V, 38.

Specifically—(a) Formerly, an officer in the English exchequer whose office it was to provide wood for the tallies, and to cut on them the sums paid. See tally. (b) In tailoring, one who measures and cuts out cloth for garments, or cuts it according to measurements made by another. (c) A bully; a bravo; a swaggering fellow; a sharper; a robber. Also cutler.

He's out of cash, and thou know'st by cutter's law we are bound to relieve one another. Rowley, Match at Midnight.

He with a crew went forth Of lucky cutters stout and bold, And robbed in the North.

True Tale of Robin Hood (Child's Ballads, V, 356).

Because thou art a miscreant bird, and despoilst thine own natural lineage, and rustest in unpaid silks and velvets, and keepest company with gallants and cutters, must we lose our memory for that? Scott, Monastery, xxvii.

2. That which cuts; an instrument or tool, or a part of one, that cuts: as, a straw-cutter; the cutters of a boring-machine.

Stewpans and saucapans, cutters and moulds, without which a cook of spirits . . . declares it utterly impossible that he can give you anything to eat.

Bulwer, Last Days of Pompeii, IV, 2.

Specifically—(a) The broad chisel-edge of a center-bit, lying between the nicker, or outer knife-edge, and the center, or pin. (b) A knife or an indenting-tool used in testing the explosive pressure of powder in large guns. See pressure-gauge. (c) In diamond-cutting, a wooden hand-tool in which that one of two diamonds undergoing cutting which is least advanced is cemented. The other stone is cemented in the set, and the two are then rubbed together. (d) A wad-punch. E. H. Knight. (e) An upright chisel on a screw, a back-tron. E. H. Knight. (f) A file-chisel. E. H. Knight. (g) In agri., a cutter. (h) A fore tooth that cuts, as distinguished from a grinder; an incisor.

The other teeth (the cutters and dog teeth) have usually but one root. Boyle, Works, V, 38.

3. Naut.: (a) A double-banked boat used by ships of war.

I hoisted out the cutter, and manned her with an officer and seven men. Cool, Voyages, III, II, 2.

(b) A small vessel with a single mast, a mainsail, a fore-and-aft, and a jib set to bowsprit end. Cutter-yachts are sloop-rigged vessels, and the name is now generally applied to Cutter-yacht.

sloops of considerable draft and comparatively small beam.—4. A small light sleigh, with a single seat for one or two persons, usually drawn by one horse. [U. S.]

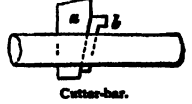

Sleighs are swarming up and down the street, of all sorts and sizes, from the huge omnibuses with their thirty passengers to the light, airy painted cutters, with their solitary, far-capped tenants. The Upper Ten Thousand, p. 4.

In mining: (a) A joint or crack, generally one which intersects or crosses a better-defined system of cracks or joints in the same rock. (b) In coal-mining, the system of joint-planes in the coal which is of secondary importance, being not so well developed as another set called the back, face, or cleat of the coal: generally used in the plural: as, backs and cutters.—6. In mineral, a crack in the substance of a crystal, which destroys or greatly lessens its value as a lapidaries' stone.—7. A soft yellow malmbrick, used for face-work, from the facility with which it can be cut or rubbed down.—8. In a weavers' loom, the box which contains the quills.—Backs and cutters. See back.—Drumcut, an elliptical or oblong outer-head, so placed on the shaft that it rotates in a circular path; a wabbler. E. H. Knight.—Eccentric cutter. (a) A small instrument used by workers in ivory. It is formed like a drill-stock, and is moved by a bow. The cutting-point can be fixed at different distances from the center by means of a groove and screw. It can also be used on the mandrel of a lathe for ornamenting surfaces. (b) A cutting-tool for a lathe having an independent motion of its own on the slide-rest. It produces eccentric figures, but by a method that is the reverse of that of the eccentric chuck (which see, under chuck).—Hanging cutter, in some plows, a cutter which depends from the plow-beam.—Mill-board cutter. See mill-board.—Revenue cutter, a light-armed government vessel commissioned for the prevention of smuggling and the enforcement of the customs regulations. Formerly the vessels for the protection of the United States revenue were cutter-rigged, but now the name is applied indiscriminately, although almost all the revenue vessels are steamers, and the few remaining sailing vessels are schooner-rigged.—Rigging-cutter, an apparatus for cutting the rigging of sunken vessels, to remove the masts, etc., lest they should interfere with navigation.

cutters (kut-ér), v. [E. dial., appar. a var. of quitter, equiv. to whittor, speak low, murmur: see quitter, whittor.] I. trans. To speak low; whisper; murmur, as a dove.

II. trans. To fondle. [Prov. Eng.]

cutter-bar (kut-ér-bär), n. In mech.: (a) The bar of a boring-machine which carries the cutter a in a slot formed diametrically through the bar, the cutters being fixed by a key b, as shown in the figure. In the special form of boring-machine called boring mill, two or more cutters are arranged around a traversing boring-block carried by the bar (in this instance called boring-bar), the block being moved by a screw parallel with the bar. (b) The reciprocating bar of a mowing-machine or harvester, carrying the knives or cutters.

Cutter-bar.

cutter-grinder (kut-ér-grin-där), n. A tool or machine adapted for grinding cutters of any kind, as the knives of mowing-machines, or the rotary cutters used in milling, gear-cutting, etc. It consists of a grindstone or emery-wheel, or a combination of such stones or wheels mounted on spindles, and driven by appropriate mechanism.

cutter-head (kut-ér-hed), n. A rotating head or stock, either shaped and ground to form a cutter, or so devised that bits or blades can be attached to it, used with planing, grooving, and molding-machines, etc.

cutter-stock (kut-ér-stok), n. A head or holder in which a cutting-tool is secured, as in a lathe.

cutthroat (kut-thrót), n. and a. [Cut, v., + obj. throat.] I. n. 1. A murderer; an assassin; a ruffian.

The wretched city was made a prey to robbers and cutthroats. Froude, Caesar, p. 74.

2. The mustang grape of Texas, Vitis candicans: so called from its acrid taste. Sportsman's Gazette.—3. A dark lantern in which there is generally horn instead of glass, and so constructed that the light may be completely obscured. Jamieson. [Scotch.].—4. A piece of ordnance. Jamieson. [Scotch.].

II. a. Murderous; cruel; barbarous.

You call me misbeliever, cut-throat dog, And spit upon my Jewish gaberdine, And all for use of that which is mine own.

Shak., M. of V., I, 2.

Thou art a slave, A cut-throat slave, a bloody, treacherous slave!

Beau and FL, Maud's Tragedy, III, 2.

cutthroat (kut-thrót), v. t. [Cutthroat, n.] To cut the throat of. [Rare.]

Money, Archanes.

Is now a god on earth: . . . Bribes justice, cut-throats honour, does what not?

Beau and FL, Laws of Candy, IV, 2.

cutting (kut-ing), p. a. [Ppr. of cut, v.] 1. Penetrating or dividing by a cut, as of an edged tool; serving to penetrate or divide; sharp.—2. Wounding or deeply affecting the feelings, as with pain, shame, etc.; satirical; severe: applied to persons or things: as, he was very cutting; a cutting remark.

But he always smiled; and audacious, cool, and cutting, and very easy, he thoroughly mortified mankind.

Diary, Henrietta Temple, ii 15

He [Sedley] was reprimanded by the court of Kings Bench in the most cutting terms.

Marsley, Hist Eng, v 1

The collision duly took place. . . An insulting sneer, a contemptuous taunt, met by a nonchalant but most cutting reply, were the signals.

Charlotte Brontë, Rhuley, xxxiii

34. Thieving; swaggering; bullying

Wherefore have I such a company of cutting knaves to wait upon me? Greene, Fraser Balaan and Fraser Bangay

Y. Love He's turn'd gallant

E. Love Gallant!

Y. Love Ay, gallant, and is now call'd Cutting Morecraft

Beau and Pl., Scornful Lady, v 3

Cutting-down line, in ship building a curve in the sheers-draft corresponding to the upper surface of the throats of the floors amidships, and to the under side of the keel son.

cutting (kut'ing), n. [ME. cuttyng, hitting; verbal n. of cut, v.] 1. A piece cut off; a slip; a slice; a clipping. Specifically—(a) A small shoot or branch cut from a plant and placed in the earth, or in sand, etc., to root and form a new plant.

Propagation by cuttings has been long known, and is abundantly simple when applied to such free-growing hardy shrubs as the willow and the gooseberry.

London, Encyc. of Gardening, p 637.

(b) A section, a thin slice used for microscopic purposes. (c) A slip cut from a newspaper or other print containing a paragraph or an article which one wishes to use or preserve.

2. An excavation made through a hill of rising ground, in constructing a road, railway, canal, etc.; the opposite of filling.—3. The action of a horse when he strikes the inner and lower part of the fetlock-joint with the opposite hoof while traveling.—4. A caper; a curvet.

Changes, cuttings, turnings, and agitations of the body Florio, tr. of Montaigne's Essays, p 228

5. In coal-mining, work done in mining or getting coal so that it may be broken down. The holing or undercutting is parallel with the stratification and at the bottom of the mass, the cutting is at right angles to this, and the effect of the two operations is to isolate a certain quantity of coal, which is afterward broken down by powder or wedges. Sometimes called earring.

6. pl. The refuse obtained from the sieve of a hutch.—7. pl. Bruised groats, or oats prepared for gruel, porridge, etc.—8. See the extract.

When the goods show a bright orange colour they are lifted and winced in water. This process, the reduction of the reds and pinks to the depth of shade they are to have when finished, is called cutting.

W. Crookes, Dyeing and Calico printing, p 576

cutting-board (kut'ing-bōrd), n. A board used on a bench or on the lap in cutting leather or cloth.

cutting-box (kut'ing-boks), n. 1. A machine in which hay, straw, corn-stalks, etc., are cut into short pieces as feed for cattle.—2. In diamond-cutting, a box into which the diamond-dust falls when the diamonds which are cemented into the cutter and setter are rubbed against each other.

cutting-engine (kut'ing-en'jin), n. In silk-manuf., a machine for cutting refuse or floss silk, after it has been disentangled and straightened, into short lengths that may be worked upon cotton-machinery.

cutting-file (kut'ing-fil), n. The toothed cutter of a gear-cutting engine. E. H. Knight.

cutting-gage (kut'ing-gāj), n. A tool having a lancet-shaped knife, for cutting veneers and thin wood.

cutting-line (kut'ing-lin), n. In bookbinding, a sketch-line drawn on a folded sheet of book-paper, showing where the cutting-knife will trim the margin.

cutting-lipper (kut'ing-lip'er), n. A cyprinoid fish of the tribe Chondrostomi or subfamily Chondrostominae, having trenchant jaws.

cuttingly (kut'ing-li), adv. In a cutting manner.

cutting-nippers (kut'ing-nip'ers), n. pl. A pair of nippers with sharp jaws especially adapted for cutting. The cutters may be placed either parallel to the axis or at various angles with it. Also cutting-pliers.

cutting-plane (kut'ing-plān), n. A carpenter's smoothing-plane. E. H. Knight.

cutting-pliers (kut'ing-pli'ers), n. pl. Same as cutting-nippers.

cutting-press (kut'ing-pres), n. 1. A screw-press or a fly-press used in cutting shapes or planchets from strips of metal.—2. In bookbinding, a wooden screw-press of small size to which is attached a knife sliding in grooved bearings, used for trimming single books. Also called plow-press or plow and press.

cutting-punch (kut'ing-punch), n. A punch with a circular face for cutting grommet-holes in sails, disks or wads from leather, cloth, metal, etc., tongue-holes in leather straps, and for various similar uses.

cutting-shoe (kut'ing-shō), n. A horseshoe having nails on one side only; a feather-edge shoe: used for horses that cut or interfere. E. H. Knight.

cutting-spade (kut'ing-spād), n. A sharp flat implement, resembling a broad thin chisel, fixed to a pole ten feet or more in length, used to cut the blubber from a whale. C. M. Seamon, Marine Mammals.

cutting-thrust (kut'ing-thrust), n. A tool for making grooves in the sides of boxes, etc.

cuttle (kut'l), n. [Early mod. E. also cuttel; ME. cotul, cotull, codull, rodulle, < AS. cudele, the cuttlefish (L. sepia); also called sdoo-scite, lit. ooze-discharger, with reference to its discharge of sepia. The change to cuttle may have been due to association with cuttle, a knife, or with cut, with reference to the shape of the cuttlebone. (cf. W. morylloll, the cuttlefish, lit. sea-knife (< mor, sea, + cylloll, knife); F. dial. rousteau (F. rousteau de mer, cuttlefish, lit. sea-knife.) 1. A cuttlefish.

It is somewhat strange, that . . . only the blood of the cuttle should be as black as ink Bacon

Shel fish they eat, and the cuttle, whose blood, if I may so term it, is like ink a delicate food, and in great request Sandys, Travels, p 64

2. Cuttlebone.

cuttle (kut'l), n. [OF. coustel, cuttel, a knife: see cukel, cukler, cutlas. cf. cutting.] 1. A knife, especially one used by cutpurses or pick-pockets.

Dismembering himself with a sharp cuttle Ep. Bale, English Votaries, ii 2

2. Same as cutter, 1 (c).

I'll thrust my knife in your mouldy chaps, if you play the saucy cuttle with me Shak, 2 Hen. IV, ii 4

cuttle (kut'l), v. i. [Var. of cutter, q. v.] To talk; chat.

I have been to town on purpose to wait on him, recollecting how you used to cuttle over a bit of politics with the old Marquis Walpole, Letters, ii 53

cuttlebone (kut'l-bōn), n. The internal plate of Sepia officinalis, consisting of a friable calcareous substance, formerly much used in medicine as an absorbent, but now chiefly for polishing wood, paint, varnish, etc., and for pounce and tooth-powder. A cuttlebone is often hung in the cage of canaries, its slightly saline taste being relished by the birds and acting as a gentle stimulus to their appetite, and its substance affording lime for the shells of their eggs. Also called apocot. See cut under Dibranchiata.

cuttlefish (kut'l-fish), n. [< cuttle + fish; cf. D. kuttelback (Kilian; now inkfish), cephalopodous mollusk, with a depressed body, enclosed in a sac. The shorter arms or feet, eight in number, covered with four rows of suckers or tentacles, are arranged around the mouth, and from the midst of them extend two long tentacles, also furnished with disks. These members the animal uses in walking, for attaching itself to objects, and for seizing its prey. A tube or funnel exists below the head and leads from the gills, through which the water admitted to these organs is expelled; and the creature, by ejecting the water with force, can dart backward with amazing velocity. In a sac on the back of the mantle there is a light, porous, calcareous shell formed of thin plates; this is the cuttlebone or sepist, corresponding to the calamary or open of the squid. (See calamary) The cuttlefish has the power of ejecting a black, ink-like fluid, the sepia of artists (see sepia), from a bag or sac, so as to darken the water and conceal itself from pursuit. From this usage the term cuttlefish is extended not only to all the forms of Sepioidae and related decapod cephalopods, but also to the octopod members of the same class. When the octopods are called cuttlefishes, the decapods are commonly distinguished as sepids. The two figures illustrate the two principal types. See Dibranchiata, ink-bag, and Sepia.

1 Cuttlefish of the Decapod Type (Sepia officinalis): a, a', arms with suckers; b, a beak with suckers on the sides. 2. Head of one of the tentacles, showing the suckers. 3. Cuttlebone (the interior shell). 4. Upper view of central part of animal, showing the mouth (c), arms (a, a'), and tentacles (t, t'). 5. The beak or mouth (b). 6. One of the suckers.

cuttlefish-bone (kut'l-fish-bōn), n. Same as cuttlebone.

cutto, cuttos (kut'ō), n. [< F. coutas, a knife: see cutlas.] A large knife formerly used in New England. Bartlett.

There were no suits of knives and forks, and the family helped themselves on wooden plates, with cuttos S. Judd, Margaret, i 2

cuttoo-plate (kut'ō-plāt), n. [< "cuttoo", of unknown origin, + plate.] In a vehicle, a hood secured to the axle or bolster, and extending over the nave or hub, to protect the axle from mud.

cut-toothed (cut'tōthd), a. In bot., toothed with deep incisions.

cutty (kut'i), a. and n. [Sc., also cuttie, etc., dim. from cut.] 1. a. 1. Cut short; short: as, a cutty spoon.

Her cutty mark o' Paisley harn Burns, Tam o' Shanter That was the only smoke permitted during the entertainment, George Warrington himself not being allowed to use his cutty pipe Theobald, Newcomes, xliii

2. Testy; hasty.

II. n.; pl. cutties (-iz). 1. A short spoon.

It is better to sup with a cutty than want a spoon Scottish proverb.

2. A short-stemmed tobacco-pipe.

I'm no me scant o' clean pipes as to blaw wi' a brunt cutty Scottish proverb.

3. A popgun. Also called cutty-gun.—4. The common hare, Lepus timidus.—5. A short, thick-set girl.—6. A slut; a worthless girl or woman; a wanton. Also cutty-quean.

cutty-gun (kut'i-gun), n. [Sc.] Same as cutty, 3.

cutty-quean (kut'i-kwēn), n. 1. Same as cutty, 6.—2. The cutty-wren. Montagu.

cutty-stool (kut'i-stōl), n. 1. A low stool.—2. A seat in old Scottish churches in which acknowledged female offenders against chastity were placed during three Sundays, and publicly rebuked by their minister.

cutty-wren (kut'i-ren), n. The wren. Montagu.

cutwal (kut'wāl), n. [< Hind. and Per. kotwal, the chief officer of police, Mahratta kotwal, the village watchman and messenger.] In the East Indies, the chief police officer of a city.

cutwater (kut'wā'tēr), n. [< cut, v., + obj. water.] 1. The fore part of a ship's prow, which cuts the water. Also called false stem. It [a shot] struck against the head of a bolt in the cutwater of the Dartmouth ship, and went no further. Wainthrop, Hist. New England, ii 222

2. The lower portion of the pier of a bridge, formed with an angle or edge directed up the stream, so as more effectually to resist the action of the water, ice, etc.—3. The ramorbill, or black skimmer, Rhyacophaga nigra.

Cuttlefish of the Octopod Type (Octopus vulgaris).

G. kuttelback, both prob. of E. origin.] A cephalopod; specifically, a cephalopod of the genus Sepia and family Sepiidae; a dibranchiate cutworm (kut'wôrd), n. A name applied to various common marine algae, such as Fucus vesiculosus, F. serratus, and Laminaria digitata.

cut-work (kut'wôrk), n. and a. 1. In embroidery, appliqué work: so called because the pattern is cut out and sewed upon the ground.—2. The earliest form of lace; fine needlework upon linen or silk from which a part of the background was cut away, leaving the design pierced. See lace.

This comes of wearing Scarlet, gold lace, and outworks!
B. Jonson, Devil in an Ass, III. 1.

II. a. Made of cut-work.

It grazed on my shoulder, takes me away six puris of an Italian cut-work band I wore.

B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour, IV. 4.

cutworm (kut'wôrm), n. A name given to a large number of lepidopterous larvae belonging to the family Noctuidæ. They hide during the day under some shelter or beneath the surface of the a, larva of Agrotis megeroma; b, c, mouth and larva of Agrotis scenedesmus. (All natural size) ground, and come forth at night to cut off, just above or just below the surface, all sorts of tender plants, but particularly maize, cabbage, and melons. Some, like Agrotis coccinea, climb on vines and young trees and eat out the buds. Agrotis megeroma is one of the commonest.

cuveit, cuveit, r. Obsolete spellings of cuveit.

cuvette (kû-vet'), n. [F., dim. of cuve, < L. cupa, a tub, ML. a cup, etc.: see cup.] 1. In decorative art, a portable basin of ornamental form in pottery or porcelain, etc., especially one of the flat-bottomed vessels commonly sold with an alginate or water-pot: frequent in falience of the eighteenth century.—2. In glass-manuf., a basin for receiving the melted glass after refining, and decanting it on the table to be rolled into a plate. In casting, the cuvette is lifted by means of gripping-tongs, chains, and a crane, and the contents are poured upon the setting table. E. H. Knight 8. In fort., a trench dug in the middle of a large dry ditch; a cunette.

Cuvieria (kû-vî-â'ri-ân), n. [NL., < Georges Cuvier, the celebrated French naturalist.] 1. A genus of holothurians, having scales on the dorsal integument.—2. A genus of thecosomatous pteropoda, resembling Styloka, but having the hinder part of the shell partitioned, the fore part swollen and subcylindric. C. columella is an example. Synonymous with Cleodora. Also Cuvieria. Bang, 1837.—3. A genus of scalephs. Péron and Lesueur, 1807.—4. A genus of crustaceans. Desmarest, 1825.

Cuvierian (kû-vî-â'ri-ân), a. [(Cuvier + -ian.)] In nat. Met., relating or pertaining to or named after Georges Cuvier (1769-1832), or his system of classification.

The three Cuvierian subkingdoms of the Radiata, Articulata, and Mollusca. Deussen, Origin of World, p. 213

Cuvierian organs, in echinoderms, certain appendages of the cloaca, simple or branched, containing a viscid or solid substance. Their function is uncertain.

Cuvieridae (kû-vî-â'ri-ân), n. pl. [NL., < Cuvier + -idae.] 1. A family of echinoderms.—2. A family of thecosomatous pteropoda, typified by the genus Cuvieria: generally referred to the family Hyaleidae or Coscinidae.

cuvy (kû-vî), n.; pl. cuvies (-vîs). A kind of seaweed, the devil's-apron, Laminaria digitata. (Okeny.)

The Okeny help-men have assigned peculiar names to each, calling the ordinary Laminaria digitata cuvy.

Harvey, Physiological Zoology.

Cusco bark, Cusco china. Same as Cusco bark (which see, under bark).

Cwmry, n. pl. Same as Cymry.

cwt. An abbreviation compounded of c. for Latin centum, hundred, and wt. for English weight, used for hundredweight.

Cy. The chemical symbol of cyanogen.

-cy. [(1) Of ult. L. origin: formerly also -cie, ME. -cie, OF. -cie, F. -cie, -ce, etc.; often an extension of -ce (q. v.), resting more directly upon the orig. L. -cia or -cia; as innocence, innocency, convenience, conveniencey, etc. (see -ancy, -ency); so fallacy, ME. fallace, < F. fallace, < L. fallacia, etc.; ult. or directly < L. -cia, or -cia, a termination of abstract nouns, < -i- (as -ia, pp. suffix, or -i- (as -i-), pp. suffix), or -ci-, + -ia, a fem. formative. From meaning 'condition,' the termination has now come to signify, in many newly formed words, 'office'; as in captaincy, curacy, lieutenancy (the final i is merged in -cy = -cia), chaplaincy, cornetcy, etc. (2) Of ult. Gr. origin: < F. -cie, etc., L. -cia, < Gr. -cia; as in fancy, Gr. phrasia; < F. -cie (pron. -ne), < Gr. -ria, as in aristocracy, democracy; < F. -cie, < Gr. -reia, as in necromancy; < Gr. -reia, as in piracy; etc.] A termination of nouns, chiefly abstract, of various origin, often associated with or derived from adjectives in -ant<sup>1</sup>, -ent, or -ate<sup>1</sup>. See the etymology.

cyamid (si'a-mîd), n. A crustacean of the family Cyamidae.

Cyamidae (si'am-i-dê), n. pl. [NL., < Cyamus + -idae.] A family of lepidopodous, edriophthalmous crustaceans, formed for the reception of the cephalopod of the genus Cyamus, the species of which are parasitic chiefly on whales, and are known as whale-lice.

Cyamus (si'a-mus), n. [NL., < Gr. κῡαμος, a bean.] The typical and only genus of lepidopodous crustaceans of the family Cyamidae; the whale-lice. Cyamus cœli has a broad flat body with a rudimentary abdomen.

Cyan (si'an), n. Same as cyanogen.

Cyanina, n. [NL.] See Cyanina.

Cyanamide (si'an-i-mîd or -mîd), n. [(Cyan + -ogen) + -amide.] A white crystalline body (CN.NH<sub>2</sub>) prepared by the action of ammonia on cyanogen chloride.

cyanate (si'a-nât), n. [(Cyan + -ate).] A salt of cyanic acid.

cyan-blue (si'an-blû), n. [(Cyan + -blue).] A greenish-blue color; the color of the spectrum from .505 to .487 micron, or of such light mixed with white.

Cyanes (si'a-nê-â), n. [NL., fem. of L. cyanus, dark-blue: see cyanous.] The typical genus of the family Cyanidae. The tentacles are bundled beneath the thick lobed disk, and there are 8 radial and as many intermediate gastric pouches, breaking up into small ramifications near the ends of the marginal lobes. C. arctica is the common large red jelly fish of the coast of the United States attaining a diameter of a foot or more. It is capable of stinging severely. Also Cyanus.

cyanean (si'a-nê-an), a. [(Cyan + -ean).] A dark-blue (see cyanous), + -an.] Of an azure color; cerulean. Pennant.
Cyanecula (si'a-nê-kû-lâ), n. [NL., < Gr. κῡανερ, dark-blue, + L. dim. -cula.] A genus of sylvine birds related to the redstarts (Erythraeus), containing the bluestarts, as C. caerulea of Europe, Asia, and North America. C. L. Brehm, 1838. See cut under bluestart.

cyaneid (si'a-nê-id), n. A jellyfish of the family Cyaneidae.

Cyaneidae (si'a-nê-i-dê), n. pl. [NL., < Cyaneus + -idae.] A family of Discomedusæ, typified by the genus Cyanea, with a simple cross-shaped mouth, surrounded by four adradial folded mouth-arms. The gastric cavity has 16 or 32 broad radial pouches and branched canal flap canals, with no marginal; there are 8 or 16 marginal bodies, and 8 or more long hollow tentacles. Also Cyaneide.

cyaneous (si'a-nê-us), a. [(Cyan + -ous).] A dark-blue, < Gr. κῡανερ, dark-blue, < κῡανος, a dark-blue substance (supposed to be blue steel), lapis-lazuli, the blue corn-flower, sea-water, etc., as adj. dark-blue.] Azure-blue; cerulean.

cyanhydric (si'an-hî-drik), a. [(Cyan + -hydric).] In chem., hydrocyanic; prussic.

cyanic (si'an-ik), a. [(Cyan + -ic).] In second sense with ref. to cyanogen.]

1. Blue: in bot., applied to a series of colors in flowers, including all shades of blue, and passing through violet and purple to red. The zanthe series, on the other hand, passes from yellow through orange to red. The variations in color of any flower are in general confined to one of these series.
2. Pertaining to or containing cyanogen.—Cyanic acid, a compound of cyanogen and oxygen (CNEO), which is a strong acid, but unstable except at low temperatures.

Cyanide (si'an-i-dê), n. pl. [NL.] Same as cyanide.

cyanide (si'a-nîd or -nîd), n. [(Cyan + -ide).] In chem., a combination of cyanogen with an element or a compound radicle capable of acting as an element. Potassium cyanide is the most important. It is a crystalline solid, permanent in dry air, but decomposed in moist air, giving off an odor of prussic or hydrocyanic acid. It has a bitter taste, and is extremely poisonous. It is extensively used in photography, electro metallurgy, and as a laboratory reagent.—Cyanide powder, a salt of potassium, much used in electroplating.

cyanine (si'a-nîn), n. [(Cyan + -ine).] The blue coloring matter of certain flowers, as the corn-flower, violet, and species of iris.—Cyanine blue. See blue.

cyanite (si'a-nîit), n. [(Cyan + -ite).] A silicate of aluminum, occurring in bladed to fibrous crystalline aggregates and in triclinic crystals. Its prevailing color is blue, whence its name, but varying from a fine Prussian blue to sky-blue or bluish white, also green or gray. It has the same composition as andalusite and sillimanite. Also hyacinth and diathene. See cut under bladed.

Cyanocephalus (si'a-nô-sef'-â-lus), n. [NL., < Gr. κῡανος, dark-blue, + κεφαλή, head.] A notable genus of corvine birds of America, having a short square tail, long pointed wings, a peculiarly shaped bill, and naked nostrils. It contains but one species, the blue crow of North America, C. cyanocephalus, better known as Cyanocitta cyanocephala, or Cyanocitta caerulea; also called blue-headed jay and phoebe jay. It represents a type intermediate between crows and jays. The bird is abundant in the mountainous regions of the West, especially where the pitch pine grows.

cyanochoire (si'a-nô-kro'-ik), a. [(Cyanochois + -ic).] Of a bluish color; affected with cyanochois; cyanoosed.

cyanochoirus (si'a-nô-kro'-rus), a. [(Cyanochois + -ous).] Same as cyanochoire.

Cyanocitta (si'a-nô-sit'-â), n. [NL. (Strickland, 1845), < Gr. κῡανος, dark-blue, + κῡττα, Attic form of κῡαα, a chattering bird, the jay, or, according to others, the magpie.] A genus of American jays, of which blue is the chief color.

Blue Jay (Cyanocitta cristata).

The term is used with great latitude by different writers, sometimes covering all the American blue jays, and sometimes restricted to one or another group of the same, exchanging places with Cyanocorax, Cyanogarrulus, Cyanocitta, Cyanurus, etc. Its type is the common crested blue jay of the United States, C. cristata. C. stelleri is Steller's jay of western North America, which runs into several local races.

Cyanocorax (si'-a-nok'-o-raks), n. [NL. (Boie, 1836), < Gr. κίταρος, dark-blue, + αἰσάξ, raven, crow.] A genus of American blue jays. See Cyanocitta.

Cyanoderma (si'-a-nō-dēr-mā), n. [NL., < Gr. κυανός, dark-blue, + δέρμα, skin.] In pathol., same as cyanosis.

Cyanogarrulus (si'-a-nō-gar'-ō-lus), n. [NL. (Bonaparte, 1850), < Gr. κυανός, dark-blue, + L. garrulus, chattering.] A genus of American blue jays. See Cyanocitta.

Cyanogen (si'-an'-ō-jen), n. [Gr. κυανός, dark-blue, + -γεν, producing: see -gen.] Chemical symbol Cy. A compound radical, CN, composed of one atom of nitrogen and one of carbon. This radical cannot exist free, but the double radical (C<sub>2</sub>N<sub>2</sub>) exists as a gas called cyanogen. It is a gas of a strong and peculiar odor, resembling that of crushed peach-leaves, and burning with a rich purple flame. Under a pressure of between three and four atmospheres it becomes a limpid liquid; and it is highly poisonous and irrespirable. It is obtained by heating dry mercury cyanide. It unites with oxygen, hydrogen, and most other non-metallic elements, and also with the metals, forming cyanides. In combination with iron it forms pigments of a dark-blue color, variously called Prussian blue, Chinese blue, Berlin blue, and Turnbull's blue. Also cyan.

Cyanometer (si'-a-nom'-e-ter), n. [Gr. κυανός, dark-blue, + μέτρον, a measure.] A meteorological instrument contrived by Saussure for estimating or measuring degrees of blueness, as in the sky. It consists of a band of pasteboard divided into fifty-one numbered compartments, each of which is painted of a different shade of blue, beginning at one end with the deepest shade, formed by a mixture of black, and ending with the faintest, formed by a mixture of white. The hue of the object is measured by its correspondence with one of these shades.

Cyanometry (si'-a-nom'-e-tri), n. [As cyanometer + -y.] The measurement of intensity of blue light, especially of the blue of the sky: as, "cyanometry and polarization of sky-light." Encyc. Brit., XVII, 481.

Cyanophyl (si'-a-nō-fil'), n. [Gr. κυανός, dark-blue, + φύλλον, suffering.] Same as cyanosis.

Cyanophyceae (si'-a-nō-fis'-ē-s), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κυανός, dark-blue, + φυκος, seaweed: see Phycous.] A name frequently used for Cryptophyceae.

Cyanophyll, cyanophyll (si'-an'-ō-fil'), n. [Gr. κυανός, dark-blue, + φύλλον = L. folium, leaf. Cf. chlorophyll.] A name given by Frémy to a blue substance developed in the analysis of chlorophyll. See chlorophyll.

Cyanose (si'-a-nō-s), n. [Gr. κυανός, dark-blue.] Same as cyanosis.

Cyanosed (si'-a-nō-sed), a. [Cyanosis + -sed.] In pathol., exhibiting cyanosis; of a bluish color from defect of circulation.

Cyanosis (si'-a-nō-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. κυανός, dark-blue, + -osis.] In pathol., a blue or more or less livid color of the surface of the body, due to imperfect circulation and oxygenation of the blood; the blue jaundice of the ancients. In its worst form it is due to a congenital malformation of the heart, in which the foramen between the right and left auricles remains open after birth instead of closing up. Also cyanopathy, cyanoderma, cyanochroa, blue disease.

Cyanosulfate (si'-an'-ō-sit'), n. [Gr. κυανός, dark-blue, + -sulfate.] Sulphate of copper, or blue vitriol. Also called cyanose, chalcocyanite.

Cyanospiza (si'-a-nō-spi'-zā), n. [NL. (S. F. Baird, 1858), < Gr. κυανός, dark-blue, + οἰς, a bird of the finch kind, perhaps the chaffinch.] A genus of American finches, of small size, with moderate bill, and blue or richly variegated coloration: now usually called Passerina.

It contains the common indigo bird of the United States (C. cyanea), the lazuli finch (C. americana), the nonpareil, incomparable, or pape (C. rufa), etc. See cut under medium bird.

Cyanosis (si'-a-nō-tik), a. [Cyanosis: see -otic.] Pertaining to or resembling cyanosis; affected with cyanosis.

Cyanotis (si'-a-nō-tis), n. [NL. (Swainson, 1837), < Gr. κυανός, dark-blue, + οἰς (or) = E. ear.] A genus of South American clamatorial flycatchers, of the family Tyrannidae, the only species of which is C. rubrigastra, of Chili.

Cyanotrichite (si'-a-nō-tri'-kit'), n. [Gr. κυανός, dark-blue, + τριχίτις (trichitis), hair, + -ite.] A hydrous sulphate of copper and aluminium, occurring in velvety druses of a bright-blue color. Also called lithomite.

Cyanotype (si'-an'-ō-tip), n. [Cyan (ide) + -type.] A photographic picture obtained by the use of a cyanide.

Cyanurate (si'-a-nū'-rit'), n. [Cyanur (ide) + -ate.] A salt of cyanuric acid.

Cyanuret (si'-an'-ō-rēt'), n. [Cyanogen + -uret.] A basic compound of cyanogen and some other element or compound; a cyanide.

Cyanuric (si'-a-nū'-rik), a. [Cyanogen + -uric.] In chem., used only of an acid (C<sub>3</sub>H<sub>3</sub>N<sub>3</sub>O<sub>3</sub>), the product of the decomposition of the solid cyanogen chloride by water, of the soluble cyanates by dilute acids, of urea by heat, of uric acid by destructive distillation, etc. It is colorless, inodorous, and has a slight taste. It is a tri-basic acid, and its salts are termed cyanurates.

Cyanurus (si'-a-nū'-rus), n. [NL. (Swainson, 1831), < Gr. κυανός, dark-blue, + οἰς, tail.] A genus of American blue jays. The common crested blue jay is often called C. cristatus. See Cyanocitta. Also Cyanura.

Cyar (si'-ār'), n. [NL., < Gr. κνῆρα, a hole.] The internal auditory meatus.

Cyathacopia (si'-a-thak'-ō-pi'-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. κύαθος, a cup, + αἰών, an axle, axis.] The typical genus of fossil stone-corals of the family Cyathaxoniidae. Michelin, 1846.

Cyathaxoniidae (si'-a-thak'-ō-pi'-ā-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyathaxonia + -idae.] A family of rugose tetracoraline stone-corals, having a simple corallum, well-developed septa, and open interspatial spaces. It ranges from the Paleozoic to the present age. The corallum is simple, with a deep calice, exhibiting the tetrameric arrangement in the well-developed septa with open loculi lacking dissepiments or tabulae. They resemble the Turbinolidae, and comprise the only extant rugose corals.

Cyathes (si'-ath'-ē-s), n. [NL., < Gr. κύαθος, a cup, < κύαμα, contain.] A genus of arborescent ferns, order Polypodiaceae. It is characterized by having the spores, which are borne on the back of the frond, inclosed in a cup-shaped indusium. There are many species scattered over the tropical regions of the world. Some have short stems, but in others they reach a height of 40 or 50 feet. The stems are crowned with a beautiful head of large fronds. C. medullaris, a fine bi-pinnate or tripinnate species of New Zealand and the Pacific Islands, and known in gardens as a noble tree-form of comparatively hardy character, furnishes in its native country a common article of food. The part eaten is the soft, pulpy, medullary substance which occupies the center of the trunk, and which has some resemblance to sagu. Several species are cultivated in greenhouses for decorative purposes.

Cyathaceous (si'-ath'-ē-si-ūs), a. [Cyathes + -aceous.] Resembling or pertaining to ferns of the genus Cyathes.

Cyathi, n. Plural of cyathus.

Cyathia, n. Plural of cyathus.

Cyathiform (si'-a-thi'-fōrm), a. [= F. cyathiforme, < L. cyathus (see cyathus), a ladle, a cup, + forma, shape.] In the form of a cup or drinking-glass.

A little widened at the top. In bot., applied to cup-shaped organs, as to the ocellular crown of the flower of Nerium, also to cup-shaped organs in lower cryptogams. In entom., applied to joints of the antennae, etc. when they are more or less obconical, and hollowed at the ends.

Cyathium (si'-ath'-i-um), n.; pl. cyathia (-i-ā). [NL., < Gr. κύαθος, a cup.] In bot., a name occasionally given to the peculiar monocious inflorescence of Euphorbia, consisting of a cup-like involucre inclosing several naked male flowers, each consisting of a single stamen, and a single naked pistillate flower.

Cyathocrinidae (si'-a-thi'-krin'-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyathocrinus + -idae.] A family of crinoids, exemplified by the genus Cyathocrinus. It embraces fistulatus crinoids with a digellic base, globose calyx, radials with horseshoe like lateral facets, supporting at least two brachials, but frequently several more, and the arms have no true pinnae, but branches in regular succession to their tips. The species lived in the Paleozoic seas.

Cyathocrinite (si'-a-thok'-ri-nit'), n. [Cyathocrinidae, < Gr. κύαθος, a cup, + κρίν, a lily, + -ites.] A crinoid of the family Cyathocrinidae.

Cyathocrinus (si'-a-thok'-ri-nus), n. [NL., originally Cyathocrinites: see cyathocrinitis.] A genus of fossil crinoids or encrinurites, ranging from the Silurian to the Permian, sometimes made type of a family Cyathocrinidae.

Cyathoid (si'-a-thoid'), a. [Gr. κύαθος, a cup, + -oid, form.] Cup-shaped; cyathiform.

Cyatholith (si'-ath'-ō-lith'), n. [Gr. κύαθος, a cup, + λίθος, stone.] A form of coeolith.

When viewed sideways or obliquely, however, the cyatholiths are found to have a form somewhat resembling that of a shirt-stud.

W. B. Carpenter, Microsc., § 408.

Cyathophyllidae (si'-a-thō-fil'-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyathophyllum + -idae.] A family of Paleozoic stone-corals, of the group Rugosa or Tetracoralia, having symmetrically arranged septa in groups of multiples of four. The species are known as cup-corals, and constitute the largest and most important family of the rugose corals. The corallum is simple or compound, with more or less interrupted septa which do not form complete laminae from top to bottom of the visceral chamber, and the loculi are more or less interrupted by dissepiments. Tabulae are always present. The genera are numerous, and all Paleozoic. The family is divided by Edwards and Halmes into two subfamilies, Cyathophyllinae and Sphenocrinitinae.

Cyathophyllinae (si'-a-thō-fil'-i-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyathophyllum + -inae.] The typical subfamily of cup-corals of the family Cyathophyllidae.

Cyathophylline (si'-a-thō-fil'-in), a. Of or relating to the Cyathophyllinae or Cyathophyllidae.

Cyathophylloid (si'-a-thō-fil'-oid), a. [Cyathophyllum + -oid.] Resembling the Cyathophyllidae.

(Corals Cyathophylloid forma, with Favosites, Stryngopora, &c.), abundant, especially in the Cretaceous Limestone. Geol. Encyc. Brit., X, 248.

Cyathophyllum (si'-a-thō-fil'-um), n. [NL., < Gr. κύαθος, a cup, + φύλλον = L. folium, a leaf.] The typical genus of fossil cup-corals, of the family Cyathophyllidae. Goldfuss.

Cyathosolid (si'-a-thō-sō'id), n. [Gr. κύαθος, a cup, + ζωοειδής, like an animal: see zoooid.] In ascidians, an abortive first stage of the embryo of certain compound ascidians, as of those of the genus Pyrosoma, serving only to found a colony by gemmation. See the extract.

Fetal Pyrosoma giganteum, a Compound Ascidian, highly magnified.

The result [of the process of yolk-division] is the formation of an elongated flattened blastoderm, which occupies one pole of the egg, and is converted into what I termed the cyathosolid, which is . . . a sort of rudimentary ascidian. From this, a prolongation or stolon is given off, which becomes divided by lateral constrictions into four portions, each of which gives rise to a complete ascidioid. As these increase in size, they coil themselves round the cyathosolid, with their oral openings outwards and their cloacal openings inwards, and thus lay the foundation of a new ascidiarium. The cyathosolid eventually disappears, and its place is occupied by the central cloacal cavity. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 228.

Cyathus (si'-a-thus), n.; pl. cyathi (-thi). [L., a cup or ladle, < Gr. κύαθος, a cup or ladle: see def.] 1. In Gr. anth., a form of vase with a long handle, used especially for dipping, as for taking wine from the crater to pour into the oinochoe or directly into the cup. It was often made in the form of a ladle.

—2. An ancient liquid measure, equivalent to 1/4 of a xestes, or 1/4 of a coteyle. It is usually taken as 4.45 cubic centimeters. As a weight, it was 1 1/2 ounces, but is often taken loosely as 1 ounce.

3. In bot., a name sometimes given to a small conical or cup-shaped organ or cavity, as one of the receptacles on the frond of Marchantia.

4. [cap.] A genus of fungi belonging to the Microthecaceae. The peridium is at first closed by a veil, then widely open, like an inverted bell. It contains from 10 to 15 disk-shaped conospores, which are attached beneath to the walls of the peridium by peduncles.

Cybele (sib'e-lē), n. [L., < Gr. Κυβέλη, also written Κυβέρα, L. Cybēra.] 1. In classical myth., an earth-goddess, of Phrygian and Cretan origin, but identified by the Greeks with Rhea, daughter of Uranus and Ge, or Heaven and Cybele and Attis—Roman relief, 3d century A. D.

Earth, wife of Cronus or Saturn, and mother of Zeus or Jupiter—hence called the Mother of the Gods, or the Great Mother. In art, Cybele usually wears the mural crown and a veil, and is seated on a throne with her sacred lions at her feet. 2. [NL.] In soöl., a genus of trilobites. Loew, 1845.

Cybiu (sib'i-um), n. [NL., < L. cybium, a tunny-fish, a dish made of tunny-fish salted in pieces, < Gr. κυβιον, the flesh of the tunny salted in (square) pieces (< κύβος, a cube, a piece of salt fish); cf. κυβισ, a kind of tunny.] A genus of fishes, of the family Scombridae. A number of species are natives of the seas of the East Indies, and some are much esteemed for the table. One species, C. commersoni, is used in a dried as well as in a fresh state.

Cycad (si'kad), n. One of the Cycadales.
Cycadaceae (sik-a-dā'sē-sē), n. pl. [Cycas (Cycad) + -aceae.] A very peculiar natural order of gymnospermous plants, in many particulars having affinities with the ferns, though some of the genera resemble palms in their general appearance. They are long-lived and of slow growth. The stem is rarely branched, is elongated by a terminal bud, and bears a crown of large pinnate leaves, which are circinate in vernation. The flowers are dioecious, the male flowers in terminal cones formed of scales bearing numerous one-celled anthers on the dorsal surface. The seeds are borne on the margins of altered leaves in the genus Cycas, and on the inner surface of the petiole scales of a cone in the other genera. The wood is without resin.

a. Euphorbia b. Macrocarpa c. Inflorescence of Cycas and the pith large. The plants of this order inhabit India, Australia, the Cape of Good Hope, and tropical America. There are about 60 species, in 9 genera, of which the chief are Cycas, Samolus, Macrocarpa, Euphorbia, and Dion. The farinaceous pith of various species is used for food, and they are frequently cultivated in hothouses for ornament or because of their curious habit. The Cycadales are found in the various geological formations, beginning with the Permian. They are exceedingly abundant in the Mesozoic, and especially in the earlier stages of that series. (See Mesozoic.) On this account the Mesozoic formations are sometimes classed together as representing the "age of cycads." See Pterophyllum, Samolus, Oleaceae, Pteris, Podocarpus.

Cycadaceae (sik-a-dā'sē-sē), n. In bot., belonging to or resembling the natural order Cycadales.

Cycadiform (si-kad'i-fōrm), n. [NL. Cycas (Cycad) + L. forma, shape.] Resembling in form the cycads.

Cycas (si'kas), n. [NL., < Gr. κύκας, orig. applied to the African coccol-palm.] 1. A genus of plants, natural order Cycadales, natives of Asia, Polynesia, and Australia. They are trees with simple stems, bearing a crown of crowded pinnate leaves with numerous narrow leaflets. The pollen is contained in valvate anthers on the under surface of scales, which are united into large cones. The seeds are borne on the edges of greatly altered leaves, produced in the regular series of the ordinary leaves. The seeds of several species are made into flour for bread, and the pith of the trunk yields a coarse sago, whence the common but incorrect name of sago-palm. The species frequently cultivated in hothouses are C. revoluta, from China and Japan, and C. circinalis, of the East Indies. The seeds of the latter are known as madu-nut.

(From Le Maout and Decasme's "Traité général de Botanique.")

2. [L. c.] A plant of the genus Cycas.

Cychia, cychlid, etc. See Cochia, etc.

Cycladidae (si-klad'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < (Cycas (Cyclad) + -idae).] A family of siphonate bivalve mollusks, taking name from the genus Cycas: now called Sphæridæ (which see).

Cyclamen (sik'la-men), n. [NL., < Gr. κύκλαμος, also κύκλας, cyclamen, appar. < κύκλος, a circle, referring, it is said, to the corm or bulb-like root.] 1. A small genus of bulbous primulae-like plants, natives of southern Europe and western Asia. They are low herbs with very hard some flowers, and are favorite greenhouse-plants. The fleshy tubers, though arid, are greedily sought after by swine; hence the vulgar name swinebread.

2. [L. c.] A plant of the genus Cyclamen.

Those gay side shrines of sunny Italy where . . . gaily flower and cyclamen are renewed with every morning.
H. B. Stowe, Agnes of Sorrento, I

cyclamin (sik'la-min), n. [Cyclamen (en) + -in.] A vegetable principle found in the root of species of Cyclamen. It is white, amorphous, or in minute crystals, and has a bitter, acrid taste.

cyclamon (sik'la-mon), n. [Cyclamen (en) + -on.] In ceram., a purplish-red tint of modern introduction.

Cyclanthus (sik-lan'thus), n. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + άνθος, a flower.] A small genus of palm-like plants, type of the natural order Cyclanthaceae, which is allied to the Pandanales and includes one other genus, Cariacanthus. The species inhabit tropical America. They have fan-shaped leaves, and unisexual flowers arranged in spiral bands around the spadix.

Cyclarhis (sik'la-ris), n. [NL. (Swainson, 1824); also written Cyclaris, Cyclarhis, more correctly Cyclorhis, and strictly Cyclorhis; < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + ῥίς, nose.] A genus of American oscine passerine birds, of the family Trogonidae, or greenlets, with rounded nostrils. C. cyaneris is an example. There are some 10 species, ranging from Mexico to Paraguay.

cyclarthrodial (sik-lār-thrō-di-al), a. [C. Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + άρθρον, a particular kind of articulation, < άρθρος, articulated: see arthrodia.] Having the character of a rotatory diarthrosis or lateral ginglymus; of or pertaining to a cyclarthrosis: as, cyclarthrodial articulation; cyclarthrodial movement.

cyclarthrosis (sik-lār-thrō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + άρθρσις, articulation.] In anat., a circular or rotatory articulation, as that by means of which the head of the radius turns on the ulna, and the atlas rolls on the pivot of the axis. In the former case a circle represented by the head of the bone turns through nearly 180° upon its own center, a segment of its circumference gliding in the lesser sigmoid cavity of the ulna. In the splanco-cyclarthrosis a ring swings back and forth upon a pivot at one point inside the circumference. Also called rotatory diarthrosis and lateral ginglymus.

cyclas (sik'las), n. [L., < Gr. κύκλος, prop. adj., round (see τόκος, garment), < κύκλος, round. Cf. oiclaton.] 1. An upper tunic of ornamental character worn by women under the Roman empire, and assumed by some emperors considered effeminate, as Caligula. It was made of fine material, and had its name from the border embroidered in purple and gold which surrounded it at the bottom.

2. An outer garment similar to the surcoat, apparently circular in form, worn in the fourteenth century, especially by women. When worn by knights over their armor, it was longer behind than before, and not very close-fitting; in this use it preceded the jupon.

This . . . cyclas was in fashion . . . only in the early half of the fourteenth century, and the oiclaton . . . with it are far from numerous.

Blossom, Archæol. Jour., XIX. 252.

3. [cop.] [NL.] The typical genus of mollusks of the family Cycladidae, or Sphæridæ, having the shell equivalent, thin, ventricose, with external ligament and thick horny epidermis. The species are numerous in fresh water. Also called Sphærium.

cycle (si'kl), n. [= F. cycle = Sp. It. ciclo = Pg. cyclo, < LL. cyclos, < Gr. κύκλος, a ring, circle, wheel, disk, orb, orbit, revolution, period of time, collection of poems, etc., prob. contr. from κύκλος = AS. wæcel, contr. wæcel (> E. wheel, q. v.), = Skt. chakra, a wheel, disk, circle; prob. redupl. from a root **kar*, "to seem in Gr. κύκλος, roll (> ult. E. cylinder, q. v.).] 1. An imaginary circle or orbit in the heavens.

The sphere
With centric and eccentric scribbled o'er,
Cycle and epicycle, orb in orb.
Milton, P. L., viii. 84.

2. A round of years or a recurring period of time used as a larger unit in reckoning time; especially, a period in which certain astronomical phenomena go through a series of changes which recur in the corresponding parts of the next period.—3. Any long period of years; an age.

The cycle of a change sublime Still sweeping through.

Whittier, The Reformer.

Things exist just so long as conditions exist, whether that be a moment or a cycle.

G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, 1st ser., VI. ii. § 10.

4. Any round of operations or events; a series which returns upon itself; specifically, in physics, a series of operations by which a substance is finally brought back to the initial state.—5. In literature, the aggregate of legendary or traditional matter accumulated round some mythical or heroic event or character, as the siege of Troy and the Argonautic expedition of antiquity, or the Round Table, the Cid, and the Nibelungs of medieval times, and embodied in epic or narrative poetry or in romantic prose narrative.

Their superstition has more of interior belief and less of ornamental machinery than those to which Amadis de Gaul and other heroes of the later cycles of romance furnished a model. Hallam, Introduct. Lit. of Europe, I. ii. § 27.

It is a well-known fact that many of the most popular traditional ballads, such as those of the Arthurian cycle, "Hynd Horn" and others, were simply abridgments of older metrical romances. N. and Q., 7th ser., II. 421.

6. In bot.: (a) In the theory of spiral leaf-arrangement, a complete turn of the spire which is assumed to exist. (b) A closed circle or whorl of leaves.—7. In coral, a set of septa of equal length. See septum.

The cycles are numbered according to the lengths of the septa, the longest being counted as the first. In the young, an equal septa constitute the first cycle.

Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 147.

8. As used by the old medical sect of Methodists, an aggregate of curative means continued during a certain number of days, usually nine. Dungham.—9. [Partly as an inclusive abbreviation of bicycle and tricycle, but with ref. also to the orig. G. κύκλος, a wheel.] A bicycle or tricycle; a "wheel." [Recent.]

All the many wagons and carriages and cycles we saw above us on the modern road were being led, not driven.
J. and F. R. Pennell, Canterbury Pilgrimage.

Carnot's cycle, the succession of operations undergone by the substance in the interior of Carnot's imaginary engine; namely, the piston is first forced down without the escape of any heat by conduction; next, heat is communicated to the contents of the cylinder, but pressure is removed from the piston, so that there is no change of temperature; third, the conduction of heat being stopped, further pressure is removed, so that the piston rises still further; finally, heat is removed from the contents of the cylinder, but pressure is put on to the piston so as to preserve the temperature unchanged until the body in the cylinder is brought back to its original condition; or all these operations are reversed.—Chinese cycle. See seer-ayenay cycle.—Cycle of indiction, an arbitrary period of 15 years used in Roman and ecclesiastical history. The year A. D. 513 is taken as the first year of the first cycle.—Cycle of the saros, or Chaldean cycle, a period of very nearly 6,585 days, in which eclipses recur nearly in the same way.—Heddomadal or heptal cycle, a period of seven days or years, which was supposed, either in its multiple or submultiple, to govern many phenomena of animal life. Dunlop.—Metonic cycle, the lunar solar cycle, established by the Greek astronomer Meton, the first year of the first cycle beginning 432 B. C., June 27. It contained 19 years, of which 12 consisted of 12 lunations, and the other 7—that is to say, the 3d, 5th, 8th, 11th, 14th, 16th, and 19th—consisted of 13 lunations. At the end of the cycle the sun was in about the same position as at the beginning; in fact, 19 tropical years are 6,939.60 days, while 255 lunations are 6,939.69 days, so that there is a difference of only about 2 hours between the two. This cycle is used in ecclesiastical computations in determining the date of Easter. See golden number, under golden.—Paschal cycle, a period of 54 years, after which Easter falls on the same day of the year.—Sexagenary cycle, a cycle of 60 (years, days, hours, etc.) in use throughout the Chinese empire and the countries receiving their literature and civilization from China. It is said to have been contrived by the Emperor Hwang te, 2637 B. C. Frequently called the Chinese cycle.—Solar cycle, or cycle of Sandakya, a period of 28 years, after which the days of the week, according to the old style or Julian calendar, recur on the same days of the month.—Sothiac cycle or period, the canicular year, annus sothicus, or annus soicus, a period of 1,461 years, used in ancient Egypt.—The epic cycle, in ancient Greek literature, a series of epics collected and arranged by grammarians of the Alexandrine period, so as to present a continuous mythic history from the marriage of the first divine pair, Uranus and Ge (Heaven and Earth), to the death of Odysseus (Ulysses). With the exception of the Iliad and the Odyssey, only a few short passages from the poems included in this cycle have come down to us.

It may be that no life is found,
Which only to one engine bound Falls off, but cycle always round.

Tennyson, Two Voices.

2. [See cycle<sup>1</sup>, n., 9.] To ride or take exercise on a bicycle or tricycle. [Recent.]

It was a mistake to suppose that cycling was only suitable for the young and active; people of all ages and conditions might enjoy the benefits of the wheel.

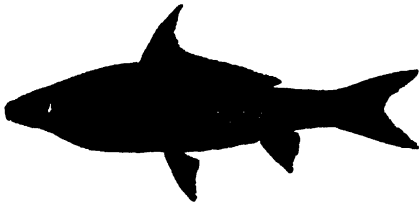

Nature, XXXIII. 180.

The cycling excursion may be of too extended a nature.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVIII. 354.

cycle<sup>2</sup>, n. A false spelling of stickle. Fuller.

Cyclopterus (sik-lep-ti's), n. pl. [NL., < Cyclopterus + -ina.] A subfamily of catostomid fishes, typified by the genus Cyclopterus, with a long dorsal fin, elongated body, and no interparietal fontanel.

Cycloptus (si-klep'tus), n. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + λεπτός, thin, fine.] The typical and only known genus of Cyclopterus. There is but one Black-horse (Cyclopterus elongatus).

(From Report of U. S. Fish Commission, 1884.)

species, C. elongatus, growing to a length of 2½ feet, common in the Mississippi valley, and popularly known as the black-horse, sucker, goat-head, goat-head-sucker, sucker, and Missouri sucker.

cyclical (si'klér), n. Same as cyclical, 2.

cyclical, n. Plural of cyclical, 1.

cyclical (sik'li-an), a. [L. cyclical, a cycle, + -an.] Same as cyclic.

The Cyclical poets, who formed the introduction and continuation to the Iliad, were therein as much drawn upon as Homer himself.

C. O. Müller, Manual of Archaeol. (trans.), § 415.

cyclic (sik'lik), a. and n. [= F. cyclique = Sp. cíclico = Pg. cyclico = It. ciclico, < L. cyclical, < Gr. κύκλος, a circle: see cycle<sup>1</sup>.] 1. a. 1. Pertaining to or moving in a cycle or circle; specifically, governed by a regular law of variation, according to which the final and initial terms of the series of changes or states are identical.

All the cyclic heavens around me spun

Mrs. Browning, Drama of Elfrida.

2. Connected with a literary cycle: specifically applied to certain ancient Greek poets (sometimes inclusive of Homer) who wrote on the Trojan war and the adventures of the heroes connected with it. See cycle, 5.

The cyclic aspect of a nation's literary history has been so frequently observed that any reference to it involves a truism.

Sedgwick, Viet. Poets, p. 224.

3. In anc. metric, delivered more rapidly than usual, so as to occupy only three times or more instead of four: used to note certain dactyls and anapaests. Thus, a cyclic dactyl is equivalent in time to a trochee, and a cyclic anapaest to an iambus.—Cyclic axis of a cone of the second order, a line through the vertex perpendicular to the circular section of the cone. Boole, 1852.—Cyclic chorua. See chorua.—Cyclic dyadial. See dyadial.—Cyclic flower. a flower in which the parts are arranged in distinct whorls.—Cyclic planes of a cone of the second order, the two planes through one of the axes which are parallel to the planes of the circular section of the cone.—Cyclic region, in geom., a region within which a closed line can be drawn in such a manner that it cannot shrink indefinitely without passing out of the region.

II. n. A cyclic poem.

The whole multitudinous people, divine and human, of the whole Greek cyclic seem to me as if sculptured in a half relief upon the black marble wall of their fate.

S. Lanier, The English Novel, p. 88.

Cycloia (sik'li-kā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of L. cycloia, < Gr. κύκλος, circular: see cyclic.] In Latreille's system of classification, the sixth family of tetramerous Coleoptera; a group of phytophagous terrestrial beetles with mostly rounded bodies, whence the name, belonging to the modern group Phytophaga, and to such families as Cassididae, Hispidae, Chrysomelidae, etc. The Cycloia were divided into three tribes, Cassidaria, Chrysomelinae, and Galerinae.

cyclical (sik'li-ka), a. [Cyclic + -al.] 1. Pertaining to a cycle; cyclic.

Time, cyclical time, was their abstraction of the Delty.

Coleridge.

2. In bot.: (a) Rolled up circularly, as many embryos. (b) Arranged in cycles or whorls; verticillate.—3. In cool., recurrent in successive circles; serially circular; spiral; whorled.

We find in the nautiloid spire a tendency to pass into the cyclical mode of growth.

W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 457.

Cyclical relation, in logic, a relation such that, in passing from a term to its correlate, and again to the correlate of that correlate, and so on, the original term is again reached.—Cyclical square or cube, in alg., a square or cube which is congruent to its base, especially with a modulus of ten.

Cyclidæ (sik'li-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyclois, 2, + -idæ.] A family of xiphosurous merostomatous crustaceans, represented by the genus Cyclois. The body is discoid and orbicular; the abdomen has three segments scarcely differentiated from the cephalic shield, and the cephalic limbs are nearly as in the larval stage of species of Lumulus. It is of Carboniferous age.

cyclidæ (si'klid), n. [F. cyclide, < Gr. κύκλος, a circle: see cyclic<sup>1</sup>, n.] In geom., the envelop of a sphere touching three fixed spheres.

Cyclidiina (sik'li-din'i-ā), n. pl. [NL., as Cyclidiina + -ina.] In Ehrenberg's system (1836), a family of illoricate, ciliated, enterodolous infusorians. See Cyclodina.

Cyclidium (si-klid'i-um), n. [NL. (Müller, 1786), < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + dim. -idium.] A genus of holotrichous infusorians, now referred to the Pleurocymella, inhabiting both fresh and salt water, as C. glaucomma. This is one of the first animalcules to appear in hay-infusions, in which it often swarms in countless numbers. They are extremely minute, requiring the higher powers of the compound microscope for their examination.

Cyclifera (si-klif'e-rā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + ferre = E. bear<sup>1</sup>.] An order of fishes comprising ganoids with subreticular or cycloid scales: same as Cycloganoidei.

cyclifying (sik'li-fi-ing), a. [Ppr. of cyclify, < L. cyclis, a circle, + -fy.] In geom., reducing to a circular form.—Cyclifying line, the generator of a cyclifying surface.—Cyclifying plane, a tangent plane to a cyclifying surface.—Cyclifying surface, a developable surface in which a twisted curve lies, and which, being developed into a plane, transforms the curve into a circle.

Cyclines (si-klin'e-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Dana, 1852), < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + -inae.] A primary division or "legion" of cyclometopous crabs, proposed for the genus Acanthocyclus.

cyclist (si'klist), n. [Cycle<sup>1</sup>, n., + -ist.] 1. One who reckons by cycles, or believes in the cyclic recurrence of certain classes of events; specifically, one who believes in the cyclic character of meteorologic phenomena, and of political and commercial crises, and endeavors to connect them with the cyclic changes of the sun's spots.—2. [Partly as an inclusive abbreviation of bicyclist and tricyclist: see cycle<sup>1</sup>, n., 9.] One who rides a bicycle or a tricycle. Also cyclo- cyclitis (si-klit'is), n. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, any circular body, + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the ciliary body.

cyclo-, [NL., etc., cyclo-, < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, ring: see cycle<sup>1</sup>.] An element in words of Greek origin, meaning 'circle.'

Cyclobranchia (si-klō-brang'ki-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + βράγχια, gills.] Same as Cyclobranchiata.

cyclobranchia (si-klō-brang'ki-an), n. [Cyclobranchia + -an.] One of the Cyclobranchiata.

Cyclobranchiata (si-klō-brang'ki-ā'tā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of cyclobranchiatus: see cyclobranchiatus.] 1. In De Blainville's system of classification, an order of gastropodous mollusks, characterized by the circular disposition of the gills, represented by the chitons and limpets. The group as thus constituted is not now generally adopted.—2. A suborder of prosobranchiate gastropods, modified from the original group by the exclusion of the chitons or polyplacophorous mollusks, and consisting only of the limpets or doecoglossate gastropods. They are prosobranchiate gastropods with flat, lamellar, foliaceous gills circularly disposed around the foot, under the edge of the mantle; a lingual armature consisting of horny toothed plates (whence the name Doecoglossa, applied by Trischel); two kidneys; no external operculatory organs; the foot large and strong, and usually flat and broad; and sometimes a dextral cervical gill. The functional gills are not modified tentacles, the true tentacles of limpets being reduced to mere papillae. See Doecoglossa, Patalidia.

Also Cyclobranchia.

cyclobranchiata (si-klō-brang'ki-āt), n. [Cyclobranchiata, < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + βράγχια, gills.] Having a circle of plaited gills, as a limpet; specifically, having the characters of the Cyclobranchiata.

cyclocephali, n. Plural of cyclocephalus.

cyclocephalic (si'klō-se-fal'ik or -sef'ā-lik), a. [Cyclocephalus + -ic.] Pertaining to or resembling a cyclocephalus.

cyclocephalus (si-klō-sef'ā-lus), n.; pl. cyclocephali (-li). [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + κεφαλή, head.] 1. In terrol., a monster whose eyes are in contact or united in one.—2. The head of one suffering from hydrocephalus. Dunghison.

Cyclocypina (si-klō-klip'ē-i-nā), n. pl. [NL., < Cyclocypus + -ina.] A group of foraminifera, typified by the genus Cyclocypus. The test is complanate or lenticular, having a disk of chamberlets disposed in concentric rings or acervular layers (with more or less lateral thickening), double septa, and a system of interseptal canals.

Cyclocypinae (si-klō-klip'ē-i-nā), n. pl. [NL., < Cyclocypus + -inae.] A subfamily of Nummulinidae. See Cyclocypina.

Cyclocypus (si-klō-klip'ē-us), n. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + L. cypus, cypus, a shield.] The typical genus of Cyclocypina.

cyclocolic (si-klō-sē'lik), a. [Cyclo, a circle, + κόλιν, the belly, the intestines, + -ic.] Arranged in coils; coiled: applied to the intestines of birds when thus disposed, in distinction from orthocolic.

cyclode (si'klōd), n. [Cyclo, a circle, + -ode, way, path. Invented by Silvester, 1868.] In geom., the nth involute of a circle.

Cyclodina (si-klō-din'ē-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, circular (see cycloid), + -inae.] In Stein's system of classification (1878), a family of peritrichous infusorians, represented by the genera Mesodinium, Didinium, and Urocentrum.

cyclodinean (si-klō-din'ē-an), a. [Cyclodina + -an.] Of or pertaining to the Cyclodina.

Cyclodus (si-klō'dus), n. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + δοτός (do-tōs) = E. tooth.] A genus of skinks or sand-lizards, of the family Scincidae, having four short 5-toed limbs, thick circular scales, a round tail, and acutely eyelids. It is named from the broad spheroidal crowns of the teeth, well adapted for crushing, as shown in the side view of the skull herewith presented. The genus belongs, like most existing lacertilians, to the division Ctenosaurus or column-skills, having a well-developed

cyclogonoid (si-klop-gon-oid), a. and n. I. a. Of or relating to the Cyclogonoid.

II. n. A fish of the order Cyclogonoides.
Cyclogonoides (si-klop-gon-oid-es), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + NL. Gonoides, q. v.] An order of osseous ganoid fishes, with well-developed branchiostegial rays, the bones of the head nearly as in the teleosts, and the scales thin and generally rounded or cycloid. The species are mostly extinct, but one family, Amia, still survives in the fresh waters of North America. See out under Amia.

cyclogon (si-klop-jen), n. [Gr. κύκλος, a circle, ring, + -γεν, producing: see -gen.] A dicotyledonous plant with concentric woody circles; an exogen.

cyclograph (si-klop-gráf), n. [Gr. κύκλος, a circle, γράφειν, describe, write.] An instrument for describing arcs of circles. It consists of two wheels of unequal diameter adjustable upon a common rod, to which the describing pencil is attached. A greater or less curvature is given by moving the small wheel from or toward the larger.

cycloid (si-klop-oid), a. and n. [= F. cycloide = Sp. cicloide = Pg. cycloide = It. cicloide, < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, ειδής, like a circle, < κύκλος, a circle, + ειδής, form.] I. a. 1. Resembling a circle; having a circular form. Specifically—2. In math.: (a) More or less circular, with concentric striations: applied to the scales of certain fishes. See out under scale. (b) Having somewhat circular scales, as a fish; specifically, pertaining to the Cycloides.
 II. n. 1. A curve generated by a point in the circumference or on a radius of a circle when the circle is rolled along a straight line and kept always in the same plane. When the point is in the circumference of the generating circle the curve is a common cycloid; when it is within the circle the curve is a prolate cycloid; and when it is on a radius produced beyond the circle the curve is a curtate cycloid. The cycloid is of great importance in relation to the theory of wave-motion.

The rolling wheel carries three pencils: that at A generates the cycloid proper, that at a the prolate, and that at a' the curvate cycloid.

2. In math.: a cycloid fish; a fish with cycloid scales, or one of the Cycloides.—Companion to the cycloid, a curve described by the intersection of a vertical line from the point of contact of a wheel rolling on a horizontal rail with a horizontal line from a fixed point on the circumference of the wheel.

cycloid (si-klop-oid), a. [Cycloid + -al.] 1. Same as cycloid.—2. Of or pertaining to a cycloid; of the nature of a cycloid: as, the cycloid space (that is, the space contained between the cycloid and its base).

It is doubtful whether, at three years old, La Place could count much beyond ten; and it, at six, he was acquainted with any other cycloid curves than those generated by the trundling of his hoop, he was a prodigy indeed. Swartz, Orations, I. 418.

Cycloid engine, paddle-wheel, pendulum. See the nouns.

cycloidean (si-klop-oid-ean), a. and n. [Cycloide + -an.] I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Cycloide.

II. n. One of the Cycloides.
Cycloides (si-klop-oid-es), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, circular: see cycloid.] In L. Agassiz's system of classification, the fourth order of fishes, including those with cycloid scales—that is, scales of the usual type, marked with concentric rings and not enameled or pectinized. It was contrasted with the orders Ctenoides, Ganoides, and Pisces. It has proved to be an artificial assemblage of forms, embracing most of the malacopterygian fishes of Cuvier, but also many of his acanthopterygians, and is not now in use.

cycloimber (si-klop-oid-bér), n. [Gr. κύκλος, a circle; εἶδος, element not obvious.] In geom., a curve drawn on the surface of a right cylinder so that when the cylinder is developed the curve becomes a circle.

Cyclolebridae (si-klop-lab-ri-dé), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, a circle (component of Cycloides, q. v.), + NL. Lebridae, q. v.] The family Lebridae, distinguished by having cycloid scales, and thus contrasted with the Ctenolebridae or Pomacentridae, long supposed to be closely related to them.

Cyclolepis (si-klop-lé-pis), n. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + λεπίς, a scale.] A genus of fossil corals, of the family Fungidae. Lamarck, 1801.

cyclometer (si-klop-mé-ter), n. [Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + μέτρον, a measure.] I. An instrument for recording the revolutions of a wheel or the distance traversed by a vehicle; an odometer.—2. A circle-square.

Cyclometopa (si-klop-mé-tóp-á), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + μέτρον, front, face.] A superfamily group of brachyurous decapod crustaceans. Its technical characters are a short, broad carapace, rounded anteriorly and laterally produced, without a projecting rostrum, 9 pairs of gills, and the male genital opening on the basal joint of the last pair of thoracic legs. It contains such genera as Cancer, Carcinus, Portunus, Xantho, etc., and corresponds to the more modern group Canceroides. In De Blainville's system of classification the Cyclometopa were characterized as having the carapace very large, arched in front, and narrowed behind; the legs moderately long, and the epistoma very short and transverse. It included the families Canthidae, Portunidae, and Pilumnidae of Leach. It has also been called Canceroides, and divided into the "legions" Cancerines, Cycloinae, Corythoides, and Thelphusines. It includes the principal edible crabs of the northern seas.

cyclometopous (si-klop-mé-tóp-us), a. [Cyclometopa + -ous.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Cyclometopa.

cyclometric (si-klop-mé-trik), a. [= F. cyclo-métrique; as cyclometry + -ic.] In geom., relating to the division of a circumference into equal parts.

cyclometry (si-klop-mé-try), n. [= F. cyclo-métrie = Sp. ciclometría, < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + μέτρον, a measure.] 1. The art of measuring circles; specifically, the attempt to square the circle.

I must tell you, that Sir H. Savile has confuted Joseph Scaliger's cyclometry. Walton, Due Correction of Hobbes, p. 116.

2. The theory of circular functions.

Cyclomyaria (si-klop-mi-á-ri-á), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + μύς, mouse, lit. a mouse, = E. mouse. Cf. muscle.] In Claus's classification, an order of free-swimming tunicates or Thaliacea, containing only the family Doliolidae. Their technical characters are: a cask-shaped body, the mouth and atrial opening surrounded by lobes, the mantle delicate, the muscles arranged in closed rings, the dorsal wall of the pharyngeal cavity formed by a branchial lamella pierced with numerous alita, the digestive canal not compressed into a nucleus, the testes and ovaries maturing simultaneously, and development accomplished by a complicated alternation of generations. In the first asexual generation there is a large auditory vesicle on the left side. Claus, Zoology (trans.), II. 108.

cyclomyarian (si-klop-mi-á-ri-an), a. [Cyclomyaria + -an.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Cyclomyaria.

cyclonal (si-klop-nál), a. [= F. cyclonal; as cyclone + -al.] Pertaining to or of the nature of a cyclone; cyclonic.

The cyclonal curvature of the wind orbit is accompanied by a stronger gradient and greater angular deviation than is the anti cyclonal curvature. Smithsonian Report, 1881, p. 205.

cyclone (si-klop-n), n. [= F. cyclone = Sp. ciclón, < Gr. κύκλος, whirling round, ppr. of κύκλω, κύκλεις, go round, whirl round, as wind or water, move in a circle, surround, < κύκλος, a circle: see cyclo.] 1. The term introduced into meteorology by Piddington, in 1840, as a general name for the class of extensive storms at sea that were at that time supposed to be characterized by the revolution of air in circles about a calm center.—2. Any atmospheric movement, gentle or rapid, general or local, on land or at sea, in which the wind blows spirally around and in toward a center. In the northern hemisphere the cyclonic motion is usually counter-clockwise, and in the southern hemisphere it is clockwise. Cyclones generally develop into cyclonic storms. See anticyclone.

Cyclones occur at all hours of the day and night, whereas whirlwinds and tornadoes show a diurnal period as distinctly marked as any in meteorology. Finally, cyclones take place under conditions which involve unequal atmospheric pressure or density at the same heights of the atmosphere, and are localized in the geographical distribution of temperature and humidity; but whirlwinds occur where for the time the air is unusually warm or moist, and where, consequently, temperature and humidity diminish with height at an abnormally rapid rate. Cyclones are thus phenomena resulting from a disturbance of the equilibrium of the atmosphere considered horizontally, but whirlwinds and tornadoes have their origin in a vertical disturbance of atmospheric equilibrium. Beane, Art., XVI. 129.

3. Popularly, a tornado (such as occur in the Western States), or any destructive storm. See tornado, water-spout, and whirlwind. [U. S.]

cyclone-pit (si-klop-nít), n. On the prairies and plains of the western United States, a pit or underground room made for refuge from a tornado or cyclone.

Cycloneura (si-klop-nú-rá), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κύκλος, a circle, + νῆρον, nerve.] A division of Hydrosora, corresponding to Hydromedusa: exposed to Troposora. Bonar.

cycloneural (si-klop-nú-rál), a. [Cycloneura + -al.] Having a complete nerve-ring, as a hydromedusan; specifically, of or pertaining to the Cycloneura; not toponeural.

cyclonic (si-klop-ník), a. [Cyclone + -ic.] Of or pertaining to or of the nature of a cyclone: as, a cyclonic area; cyclonic action; "the cyclonic motion in sun-spots," Young.

cyclonically (si-klop-ní-kal-i), adv. In the manner of a cyclone; like a cyclone.

cyclonoscope (si-klop-nó-skóp), n. [Gr. κύκλος, a circle (see cyclone), + σκοπεῖν, view.] A hurricane-indicator; an apparatus (devised by Padre Vihes, S. J., Havana) consisting of an outer card with compass-points and an inner movable card with lines, to show the direction of motion of the various atmospheric currents constituting the circulation of a tropical hurricane. The apparatus, when properly oriented and adjusted, aids an observer in detecting the existence of a hurricane in his vicinity and the bearing of its center.

Cyclopæcia (si-klop-pá-sé-á), n. pl. [NL., < Cyclope, 2, + -æcia.] A superfamily group of entomostracous crustaceans, taking name from the genus Cyclope: an inexact synonym of Copepoda.

cyclopædia, cyclopædic, etc. See cyclopædia, etc.

cyclope (si-klop), a. [L. Cyclopes: see cyclopean.] Having or using a single eye; cyclopean. [Poetical.]

Even as the patient watchers of the night,—
 The cyclope gleaners of the fruitful skies,— Show the wide misty way where heaven is white
 All paved with suns that dash our wondering eyes.
W. W. Holmes, To Christian Gottfried Harburg.

cyclopean (si-klop-pé-an), a. [= F. cyclopéen, < L. Cyclopæus, < Gr. κύκλωπες, Cyclopean (architectures), < κύκλος, Cyclops.] Of or pertaining to, or exhibiting the characteristics of, any of the legendary Cyclopes. [Commonly with a capital when used with direct reference to these beings: as, Cyclopean architecture. See below.] Specifically—(a) Having a single eye in the middle of the forehead; in zool., having a median and apparently or actually single eye. This state may be normal and permanent, as in some of the crustaceans; or normal and marking a stage of development; or monstrous, from defect of growth in the parts concerned, whereby the eyes are not separated. It occurs, for example, occasionally in the pig. (b) Single and situated in the middle of the forehead, as an eye.

A true, mean, cyclopean eye would be slightly to the right of the median line. Mind, LX. 52.

(c) Vast; gigantic: applied to an early style of masonry, sometimes imitated in later ages, constructed of stones either unheaved or more or less irregularly shaped and fitted together, usually polygonal, but in some more recent examples approaching regular horizontal courses, and often presenting joints of very perfect workmanship. Such consist of three courses, of which the stones, measuring from 6 to 9 feet long, from 3 to 4 feet wide, and from 3 to 3 feet deep, are rudely shaped, irregular masses piled on one another. Examples of Cyclopean work occur in Greece, Italy, Asia Minor, and elsewhere. The more primitive Cyclopean masonry in Greece, roughly built of stones entirely unheaved, the spaces between the larger stones being filled with smaller ones, is often termed Alieus.

cyclopæd (si-klop-péd), n. [Cyclopædia.] A cyclopædia.

Peter Lombard's scholastic cyclopædia of poetry.
T. Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, II. 460.

cyclopædia, cyclopædic (si-klop-pé-di-á), n. [Short form of encyclopædia, encyclopædic, q. v.]

1. A book containing accounts of the principal subjects in one branch of science, art, or learning in general: as, a cyclopædia of botany; a cyclopædia of mechanics.—2. In a broader sense, a book comprising accounts of all branches of learning; an encyclopædia. See encyclopædia.

cyclopædic, cyclopædis (si-klop-pé-di-k or -péd-ik), a. [Cyclopædia, cyclopædic, + -ic.] 1. Of or pertaining to a cyclopædia.—2. Resembling a cyclopedia in character or contents; exhaustive: as, cyclopedic treatment of a subject.

cyclopedical, cyclopædical (sī-klop'pē'di-kāl or -pē'di-kāl), a. Same as cyclopedic.

Cyclopes, n. Plural of Cyclops, 1.

Cyclophis (sī'klō-fis), n. [NL., < Gr. κύκλιος, a circle, + φής, a serpent.] A genus of serpents, of the family Colubridæ, containing the familiar and beautiful green-snake of the United States, C. nertalis. See green-snake.

Green snake (Cyclophis nertalis).

Cyclophoridae (sī-klop'for'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyclophorus + -idae.] A family of operculate gastropodous mollusks, typified by the genus Cyclophorus, related to and often merged in Cyclotomidae. They have a depressed shell with circular aperture and a plurilocular operculum. Leading genera are Cyclophorus, Cyclotus, Pomatius, Diplomatina, and Pupina. Also called Cyclotidae.

Cyclophorus (sī'klōf'or-us), n. [NL., < Gr. κύκλιος, a circle, + φός, a serpent = F. bear.] A genus of gastropodous mollusks, typical of the family Cyclophoridae, or referred to the family Cyclotomidae.

Cyclophorus involutus

cyclopia (sī'klō'pī-ā), n. [NL., < L. Cyclops, < Gr. κύκλιος, a circle, + πῶς, Cyclops; see Cyclops.] In teratol., a malformation in which the orbits form a single continuous cavity. Also called synophthalmia.

cyclopic (sī'klō'pik), a. [Cyclops + -ic.] [Cap. or l. c., according to use.] Of, pertaining to, or resembling the Cyclopes; cyclopean. Specifically—(a) One-eyed; cyclopean (with see). Hence—(b) Seeing only one part of a subject, one-sided. (c) Gigantic.

Sending a bill of defiance to all physicians, chirurgeons, and apothecaries, as so many bold giants, or cyclopic monsters, who daily seek to fight against Heaven by their rebellious drugs and doses! Art of Handicraftsmen.

cyclopid (sī'klō'pid), n. A member of the Cyclopidae.

Cyclopidae (sī'klō'pī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyclops, 2, + -idae.] A family of minute entomostreacous crustaceans, of the gnathostomatous section of Copepoda; so called from their simple eye. They are mostly fresh-water forms, without any heart, the second pair of antennae jointed and not biramous, the anterior antennae of the male prehensile, and the fifth pair of feet rudimentary. They are extremely prolific, and it is estimated that in one summer a female may become the progenitrix of more than four million descendants. They undergo many transformations before attaining maturity. See under Cyclops.

cyclopine (sī'klō'pīn), n. [Gr. κύκλιος, a circle, + πῶς, Cyclops; see Cyclops.] An alkaloid obtained from plants of the genus Cyclopia.

cyclopite (sī'klō'pīt), n. [Cyclopean + -ite.] A crystallized variety of anorthite, occurring in geodes in the dolerite of the Cyclopean Isles or rocks on the coast of Sicily, opposite Acireale.

cycloplegia (sī'klō'pē-jī-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. κύκλιος, a circle, + πῶς, a stroke.] Paralysis of the ciliary muscle of the eye.

Cyclops (sī'klōps), n. [= F. Cyclope = Sp. Cyclope = It. Cyclope = Fr. Cyclope = D. G. Cyclope = Dan. Sv. Cyclop, < L. Cyclops, pl. Cyclopes, < Gr. κύκλιος, pl. κύκλιες, (Cyclops, lit. round-eyed, < κύκλιος, a circle, + ὤψ, eye.] 1. Pl. (Cyclopes (sī'klō'pēs) or Cyclops). In Gr. myth. and legend: (a) A giant with but one eye, which was circular and in the middle of the forehead. According to the Hesiodic legend, there were three Cyclopes of the race of Titans, sons of Uranus and Gaia, who forged the thunderbolts of Zeus, Pluto's helmet and Poseidon's trident, and were considered the primal patrons of all smiths. Their workshops were afterward said to be under Mount Etna.

The Cyclops here, which labour at the Trade, Arr Jealousie, Fear, Madnes, and Despair Convey, The Mistrust, Monopoly.

(b) In the Odyssey, one of a race of gigantic, lawless cannibal shepherds in Sicily, under the one-eyed chief Polyphemus. (c) One of a Thracian tribe of giants, named from a king Cyclope, who, expelled from their country, were fabled to have built in their wanderings the great prehistoric walls and fortresses of Greece. See cyclopean.—2. [NL.] In zool., a genus of minute fresh-water copepods, typical of the family Cyclopidae, having a greatly enlarged pair of antennules (the appendages of the second somite of the head), by the vigorous strokes of which they dart through the water as if propelled by oars. In the front of the head there is a heavy black median eye, usually double, but appearing single, whence the name of the genus. Cyclops quadriviridis is a common water flea of fresh water ponds and ditches. See Copepoda.

3. [l. c.] A copepod of the genus Cyclops.

cyclopterid (sī'klōp'tē-rid), n. A fish of the family Cyclopteridae.

Cyclopteridae (sī'klōp'tē-ridē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyclopterus + -idae.] A family of fishes, represented by the genus Cyclopterus, and adopted by various authors with different limits. See under Cyclopterus. (a) In the old systems it embraced the true Cyclopteridae as well as Liparidae and Gobiocidae. (b) In Gunther's system it includes the true Cyclopteridae and also Liparidae. (c) By Gill and American writers generally it is restricted to Cyclopteridae of a short ventricose form, with short posterior and opposite dorsal and anal fins and a distinct spinous dorsal. The species inhabit the cold seas of the northern hemisphere.

Cyclopterina (sī'klōp'tē-rī-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyclopterus + -inae.] In Günther's system of classification, the first group of his family Thacobi, having two separate dorsal fins, and 12 abdominal and 16 caudal vertebrae.

cyclopterine (sī'klōp'tē-rīn), a. and n. 1. a. Of or relating to the Cyclopterina or restricted Cyclopteridae.

2. n. One of the Cyclopterina.

cyclopteroid (sī'klōp'tē-roid), a. and n. 1. a. Of or relating to the Cyclopteridae.

2. n. A fish of the family Cyclopteridae or superfamily Cyclopteroidae.

Cyclopteroidae (sī'klōp'tē-roi'dē-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Cyclopterus + -oidae.] A superfamily of acanthopterygian fishes, distinguished by the development of a suctorial disk resulting from the union of the ventral fins and the fixture of their rays to the pelvic bones. It includes the families Cyclopteridae and Liparidae.

Cyclopterus (sī'klōp'tē-rus), n. [NL., < Gr. κύκλιος, a circle, + πτερόν, wing.] A genus of fishes, typical of the family Cyclopteridae. By the older authors it was made to include all forms with an imperfectly ossified skeleton and the ventral fins united in a broad suctorial disk; by later authors it is restricted to the lump fish (C. lumpus) and closely related species.

cyclorama (sī'klō-rā'mē), n. [Gr. κύκλιος, a circle, + ὥρα, a view, < ὥρα, see.] A representation of a landscape, battle, or other scene, arranged on the walls of a room of cylindrical shape, and so executed as to appear in natural perspective, the spectators occupying a position in the center; a circular panorama.

It is only within a generation that cycloramas have been painted and constructed with a satisfactory degree of mechanical perfection. Appleton's Ann. Cy., 1886, p. 278.

cycloramic (sī'klō-rā-mē), a. [Cyclorama + -ic.] Relating to or of the nature of a cyclorama.

The laws of cyclorama perspective have been understood for two or three centuries. Appleton's Ann. Cy., 1886, p. 278.

Cyclorhapha (sī'klō-rā-fā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of cyclorhaphus; see cyclorhaphous.] A prime division of dipterous insects, containing those in which the pupa-case opens curvilinearly: opposed to Orthorhapha, in which the case splits straight. Brauer.

cyclorhaphous (sī'klō-rā-fus), a. [Gr. κύκλιος, a circle, + ῥαφή, a seam, a suture, < ῥάπτω, sew.] Having the pupa-case opening curvilinearly; specifically, pertaining to or having the characters of the Cyclorhapha.

Cyclosauria (sī'klō-sā-rī-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κύκλιος, a circle, + σαύρος, lizard.] A division of lacertilians or lizards. They have a short thick tongue, scarcely extensible; a round pupil; a long tail with the anus not terminal; 2 or 4 short feet, or none; the body either lacertiform or serpentine; the back with large scales; and the belly with scales not overlapping and arranged in cross-bands. The division contains the Chalcidæ, Zonuridæ, and Reptosidæ (to which some add the Monitors, etc.). The group is by some made a family, Phrynosauria, of a suborder Bremiduria.

cyclosaurian (sī'klō-sā-rī-ān), a. and n. [Cyclosauria + -ian]. 1. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Cyclosauria.

2. n. One of the Cyclosauria.

cycloscope (sī'klō-skōp), n. [Gr. κύκλιος, a circle, + σκοπεῖν, view.] An apparatus invented by McLeod and Clarke for measuring velocities of revolution at a given instant. It consists essentially of a revolving ruled cylinder that may be examined through an opening partially closed by a tuning-fork vibrating at a known rate. The observation depends on the persistence of vision, and when the intermittent appearance of the ruled lines, seen past the vibrating fork, becomes continuous, an index shows upon a scale the rate of the revolution of the cylinder.

cyclosis (sī'klō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. κύκλιος, a surrounding, < κύκλιν, surround, move around, < κύκλος, a circle; see cycle, n.] In zool., physiol., and bot., circulation, as of blood or other fluid: in zoölogy, especially applied to the currents in which circulate the finely granular protoplasmic substances in Protozoa, Infusoria, etc., as within the body of members of the genus Paramecium, and the pseudopods of foraminifera; in botany, originally, to the movement occasionally observable in the latex of plants, now to the streaming movement of protoplasm within the cell.

It is by the contractility of the protoplasmic layer that the curious cyclosis . . . is carried on within the plant-cell. W. B. Carpenter, Microsc., § 224.

cyclospermous (sī'klō-spēr-mus), a. [Gr. κύκλιος, a circle, + σπέρμα, seed, < -σπέρμα, seed.] In bot., having the embryo coiled about the central albumen, as the seeds of Argemone.

Cyclostoma (sī'klōstō-mā), n. [NL., fem. sing. (in sense 2 neut. pl.) of cyclostomus; see cyclostomus.] 1. The typical genus of the family Cyclostomidae; so called from the circular aperture of the shell. Very different limits have been given to it, the old writers including not only all the true Cyclostomidae, but also the Cyclophoridae and Pomatidae, while by most modern writers it is limited to those with a calcareous pearly operculum flattened and having an eccentric nucleus. The species are numerous, they live in damp places. C. elegans is an example. See under Cyclostomidae. Also Cyclostomus.

2. [Used as a plural.] The cyclostomatous vertebrates, or myxozoa.

Cyclostomata (sī'klōstō-mā-tā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of cyclostomatus; see cyclostomatous.]

1. A division of gymnomatous polyzoans having tubular cells, partially free or entirely connate, a terminal opening with a movable lip, and no avicularia nor vibracula: opposed to Chilostomata and Stenostomata. It is subdivided into Articulata or Radiata (family Crisidae), and Inarticulata or Incrustata, containing the rest of the families.

2. In Günther's system of classification, a subclass of fishes having the following technical characters: the skeleton cartilaginous and notochordal, without ribs and without real jaws; skull not separate from the vertebral column; no limbs; gills in the form of fixed sacs without branchial arches, 6 or 7 in number on each side; one nasal aperture only; mouth circular or sucker-like; and heart without bulbus arteriosus. Also called Cyclostomi, Cyclostomia, Marsipobranchii, and Monorhina.

cyclostomate (sī'klōstō-māt), a. [Gr. κύκλιος, a circle, + στόμα, mouth.] Same as cyclostomatous.

Of the thirty three cyclostomatous forms, thirteen had previously been known in a fossil state. Science, 1X 380.

cyclostomatous (sī'klōstō-mā-tus), a. [Gr. κύκλιος, a circle, + στόμα, mouth.] Having a circular oral aperture, or round mouth. Specifically—(a) Pertaining to the polyzoan Cyclostoma. (b) Pertaining to the round-mouthed fishes, the lampreys and hags. The usual form in ichthyology is cyclostomus.

cyclostome (sī'klōstōm), a. and n. [Gr. κύκλιος, a circle, + στόμα, mouth.] 1. a. Same as cyclostomatous.

The cyclostome fishes, possessed of cerebral ganglia that are tolerably manifest, lead us to the ordinary fishes, in which these ganglia, individually much larger, form a cluster of masses, or rudimentary brain.

E. S. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 8.

II. n. 1. A fish of the order Cyclostomi; a maripobranch; a monorhine; a lamprey or hag.—2. A gastropod of the family Cyclostomidae.

Cyclostomi (si-klos'tō-mī), n. pl. [NL., pl. of cyclostomus; see cyclostomus.] In Cuvier's system of classification, the second family of his second order, Chondropterygii branchiis flatis, with the mouth formed into a sucker, containing the lampreys and hags, or the cyclostomous, monorhine, or maripobranchiate fishes; a synonym of Maripobranchii.

cyclostomid (si-klos'tō-mid), n. A gastropod of the family Cyclostomidae.

Cyclostomidae (si-klos'tō-mī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyclostoma + -idae.] A family of tanioglossate gastropods to which different limits have been assigned. (a) By the old writers it was extended to all the operculate land-shells. (b) Later it was limited to those with a circular aperture to the shell. (c) By most modern conchologists it is restricted to forms with comparatively narrow lateral teeth bearing several cusps.

Cyclostoma elegans

are numerous in tropical and subtropical countries, and a few, as Cyclostoma elegans, extend into temperate regions. They are chiefly found in forests and damp places. The under surface of the foot is impressed by a longitudinal groove, and the sides are alternately moved in progression, while the long rostrum is used for pulling forward.

Cyclostominae (si-klos'tō-mī-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyclostoma + -inae.] A subfamily of Cyclostomidae, containing the typical species, and contrasting with the subfamilies Cistulinae, Laciniinae, and Reatinae.

cyclostomous (si-klos'tō-mus), a. [NL., < cyclostomus, < κυκλος, a circle, + στόμα, mouth.] Having a round mouth, as a lamprey, or a round aperture of the shell, as a cyclostomid; specifically, in ichth., pertaining to the Cyclostomi. Also cyclostomatic, cyclostome.

Cyclostomus (si-klos'tō-mus), n. [NL.; see cyclostomus.] Same as Cyclostoma, 1.

Cyclostrema (i-klos'trē-mā), n. [NL., improp. for **Cyclostrema*, < κυκλος, circle, + τρήμα, hole.] A genus of gastropods, typical of the family Cyclostremidae.

Cyclostremidae (si-klos'trēm-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyclostrema + -idae.] A family of rhipidoglossate gastropods, typified by the genus Cyclostrema. They have ciliated filiform tentacles, lateral cirrus appendages, a wide median tooth and four narrow teeth on each side, and marginal teeth with denticulated borders; the shell is depressed, umbilicated, unilabrous, and white. The species are of small size and found in almost all seas.

cyclostylar (si-klos'tī-lār), a. [NL., < κύκλος, a circle, + στυλος, a pillar, style, + -ar.] In arch., consisting of a circular range of columns; monopteral.

cyclostyle (si-klos'tīl), n. [NL., < κύκλος, a circle, + στυλος, a pen.] An apparatus for making duplicate copies of letters, circulars, etc., written on sensitized paper with a pen of peculiar make, or with a typewriter. The first copy is used as an impression-plate, and inked with an inking-roller to produce subsequent copies.

cyclostystem (si-klos'tīn'tēm), n. [NL., < κύκλος, a circle, + συστήμα, system.] The circular arrangement of the pores of certain hydrocoral-line aculephs (the stylasterids), simulating the calicular systems of anthozoan corals in appearance. Moseley, 1881.

cyclothure (si-klos'thūr), n. An animal of the genus Cyclothurus; a two-toed ant-eater.

Two-toed Ant-eater (Cyclothurus didactylus).

Cyclothurus (si-klos'thūr-si-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyclothurus + -inae.] A subfamily of South American arboricole ant-eaters, of the family Myrmecophagidae; the two-toed ant-eaters of the single genus Cyclothurus. The first, fourth, and fifth digits of the fore paws are so reduced that only two are visible externally, and the inner digit of the hind foot is likewise rudimentary. These ant-eaters live in trees and resemble sloths.

cyclothurine (si-klos'thūr-in), a. and n. 1. a. Pertaining to the subfamily Cyclothurinae. 2. n. One of the Cyclothurinae; a cyclothure.

Also written cyclothurine.

Cyclothurus (si-klos'thūr-rus), n. [NL., for Cyclothurus, < κυκλῶρος, round (see Cyclo-), + οὐρά, a tail.] The typical and only genus of the subfamily Cyclothurinae, containing the little two-toed ant-eater of Brazil, C. didactylus, and a species of Costa Rica, C. dorsalis. See Cyclothurinae.

cycloid (si-klot'id), n. A gastropod of the family Cycloidea.

Cycloidea (si-klot'idē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyclo- + -idae.] A family of phaneropneumous tanioglossate gastropods. The eyes are situated at the outer bases of the tentacles; the outer lateral teeth of the radula are little differentiated from the others, there are 10 jaws; and the shell is spiral with a circular aperture, closable by a multispiral operculum. Same as Cyclophoridae.

cyclotomic (si-klos'tōm'ik), a. [NL., < κύκλος, circle, + τομή, a cutting, + -ic.] In geom., pertaining to the theory of the division of the circumference of a circle into aliquot parts.—Cyclotomic divisor. See divisor.

cyclothurine, Cyclothurus. See cyclothurine, (cyclothurus).

Cyclopus (si-klos'tus), n. [NL., < κύκλος, rounded, + πούς, make round, < αἰσός, a circle.] A genus of gastropodous mollusks, of the family Cyclophoridae, or giving the name Cyclo- to the same group.

Cyclura (si-klos'thūr), n. [NL., < κύκλος, a circle, + οὐρα, tail.] A genus of lizards, of the family Iguanidae. C. lophoma is the great iguana of Jamaica, with a long serrate dorsal crest. C. scutellata is the spine-tailed lizard of Lower California. C. terre, of the same region, is the smooth-backed lizard.

cyclus (si-klos'tus), n. [NL., < κύκλος, a circle; see cycle.] 1. Pl. cyci (si-kli). Same as cycle, 5.

Gonzalo de Córdoba, "the Great Captain," ... produced an impression on the Spanish nation hardly equalled since the earlier days of that great Moorish contest, the cyci of whose heroes Gonzalo seems appropriately to close up. Picknor, Span. Lit., 181

2. [cap.] [NL.] A genus of fossil crustaceans of uncertain character.

cydariform (si-dar'i-fōrm), a. [NL., < Cydarum (< κύδαρος), a kind of ship, + forma, shape.] In entom., approaching the form of a globe, but truncated on two opposite ends: applied to joints of the palpi, etc.

cyderi, n. See cider.

Cydippe (si-dip'i), n. [NL., < L. Cydippe, < Gr. Κυδippe, in myth, a fem. name, a Nereid, etc.; appar. < κύδος, glory, renown, + ἵππος, fem. ἵππη, horse.] 1. In zool., the typical genus of stenophorans of the family Cydippidae, having retractile filiform fringed tentacles, and a transparent colorless gelatinous body, divided radially into eight parts by the stenophores. The member of the genus, C. pallens, is a very beautiful object, and is common in the seas around Great Britain. The body is globular in shape, and adorned with eight bands of blue, serving as its means of locomotion and presenting brilliant rainbow hues. From the body are pendent two long filaments, to which are attached numerous shorter threads, and which can be protruded and retracted at will. Also called Phuretophila, and formerly referred to a family Callianassidae. See ent. under Ostenophora.

2. A genus of spiders. Rev. O. P. Cambridge, 1840.—3. In entom., a genus of beetles.

cydippid (si-dip'id), n. A stenophoran of the family Cydippidae.

Cydippidae (si-dip'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cydippe, 1, + -idae.] A family of sacrate stenophorans, typified by the genus Cydippe.

Cydonia (si-dō-nī-ā), n. [NL., < L. cydonia, a quince (< ult. E. κυνή, quince, q. v.), prop. pl. (sc. mala, apples) of Cydonium, adj.; < Gr. κυδώνιον (sc. μήλον, apple), a quince, κυδωνία, a quince-tree, neut. and fem. of κυδωνιος, adj., pertaining to Κυδωνία, L. Cydonia, a town of Crete, now Canea.] 1. A rosaceous genus of plants, including the quince, etc., now referred to Pyrus.—2. In entom., a genus of ladybirds, family Coccinellidae. Mulsant.

cydonin (si-dō-nin), n. [NL., < Cydonia, 1, + -in.] The mucilage of quince-seeds.

cydonium (si-dō-nī-um), n. [See Cydonia.] Quince-seed.

cydognoia (si-dō-nī-og-nō-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. κύων, pregnancy, + γνῶσις, knowledge.] Diagnosis of pregnancy. Dunghison.

cydology (si-dō-nī-ō-jī), n. [NL., < Gr. κύων, pregnancy (see cygna), + λογία, < λέγω, say; -ology.] In physiol., the science which treats of gestation or pregnancy.

cyesis (si-dō-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. κύων, pregnancy, < κύειν, be pregnant.] Pregnancy; conception. Dunghison.

cygneous (sig'nē-us), a. [NL., < L. cygnus, cygnus, a swan; see cygnet.] In biology, curved like a swan's neck. Brathwaite.

cygnet (sig'net), n. [Formerly cygnit, < OF. cygnit, equiv. to cygnel, cygneus, dim. of cygne, F. cygne = Fr. cygne = It. cygno, a swan (cf. OF. cygne = Sp. Pg. cygne, OPg. cygne = Old. cygno, It. cygno, a swan, < ML. cygnus, cygnus, a corruption of L. cygnus), < L. cygnus, often written cygnus, < Gr. κύων, a swan, prob. redupl. from κύων, κύων, sound, = L. canere, sing. From the same root come L. cygna, a stork, and E. hen. See cant, chant, ken.] A young swan; specifically, in her., a small swan. Swans, when more than one are home, are commonly called cygnets, though the representation is exactly the same as that of the swan so called.

So doth the swan her downy cygnets save,
Keeping them pinched underneath her wings.
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., v. 2.

Cygnets royal, in her., a term for a bearing more properly blazoned swan argent ducally gorged and chained or—that is, having a duke's coronet around its neck and a chain attached to thereto. Hugh Clark.

Ocygine (sig'nī-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Cygnus, 1, + -inae.] A subfamily of lamellirostral natatorial birds, of the duck family, Anatidae; the swans. They have the longest neck of any birds of this family, the vertebrae being very numerous (up to 26), the tail is short and many feathered, the tarsus is reticulate; the lores are naked, the bill is high at the base, and sometimes tuberculate, with median nostrils; the feet are large; the middle toe and claw are longer than the tarsus; and the hallux is simple. The legs are set far back, so that the gait is constrained, but in the water the swans are proverbially elegant and graceful. There are 8 or 10 species, of various countries, chiefly of the genus Cygnus. See swan.

cygmine (sig'nin), a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Cygninae.

Cygnopsis (sig-nop'sis), n. [NL. (Brandt, 1836), < L. cygnus, a swan, + Gr. όψις, view, appearance.] A genus of geese, of the subfamily Anserinae and family Anatidae; so called from their Chinese Goose (Cygnopsis cygnoides).

swan-like appearance. The type and only species is the Chinese goose, C. cygnoides, common in domestication.

Ocygnus (sig'nus), n. [NL., < L. cygnus, prop. cygnus, a swan; see cygnet.] 1. The typical genus of the subfamily Ocygninae, formerly conterminous with it, but now including all the white swans, or even restricted to those which have a tubercle on the bill, as the mute swan of Europe, (Cygnus olor). C. muscus is the European whooping swan, or hooper. It belongs to the subgenus (Olor), as do the two American swans, the whistler, (Cygnus (Olor) columbianus), and the trumpeter, (Cygnus (Olor) buinator). See swan.

2. An ancient northern constellation repre-

The Constellation Cygnus—1 from Ptolemy's description

senting a bird called a swan by Ovid and others, and now always so considered.

Cylindrina (sil'lik-nā), n. [NL., < Gr. κύλινδρος, a small cup, < κύλις (κύλις), a cup.] A genus of tectibranchiate opisthobranchiate gastropods, of the family Turritellidae or Bullidae, or made type of a family Cylindrinidae, having a strong cylindrical shell, with narrow aperture. There are numerous species.

Cylindroid (sil'lik-nid), n. A gastropod of the family Cylindrinidae.

Cylindrinidae (sil'lik-ni-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cylindrina + -idae.] A family of gastropods, of which the genus Cylindrina is typical. The radula has multiseriate teeth, of which the central are small, the lateral large and unciform, and the marginal small and unciform.

Cylindrostomus (sil'lik-kō-mas'ti-jēs), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κύλινδρος, a cup, + στόμα, mouth.] A group of choanoflagellate infusorians or collar-bearing monads, with a well-marked collar around the base of the flagellum, including such genera as Salpinx and Codononcha. Butschli.

Cylindrotomy (sil'lik-kōt'ō-mi), n. [< Gr. κύλινδρος, a cup, + τομή, cutting, < τέμνω, cut.] In surg., division of the ciliary muscle, as in glaucoma. Duglison.

Cylindrosoma (sil'lik-kō-zō'sā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κύλινδρος, a cup, + σῶμα, animal.] Same as Cylindrosoma.

Cylinder (sil'in-dēr), n. [Early mod. E. also cylindre; in ME. in form chylindre, a cylindrical sun-dial; < OF. cylindre, F. cylindre = Sp. It. cilindro = Pg. cilindro, < L. cylindrus, a cylinder, a roller, a leveler, < Gr. κύλινδρος, a cylinder, a roller, roll, < κύλιω, roll, κύλις, roll; see cyclic. Doublet of calender, q. v.] 1. In geom.: (a) A solid which may be conceived as generated by the revolution of a rectangle about one of its sides: specifically called a right cylinder. The side of the generating rectangle forms the axis of the cylinder, and the adjacent sides generate circles which form the bases of the cylinder. (b) By extension, any surface generated by a right line moving parallel to itself.

Right Cylinder

A cylindrical surface is a curved surface generated by a moving straight line which continually touches a given curve, and in all of its positions is parallel to a given fixed straight line not in the plane of the curve. A solid bounded by a cylindrical surface and two parallel planes is called a cylinder. Chauvenet.

2. In mech.: (a) That chamber of a steam-engine in which the force of steam is exerted on the piston. See steam-engine. (b) The barrel of an air-pump. (c) A hollow metallic roller forming part of certain printing-machines. In cylinder presses the cylinder is used only for giving the impression. See cylinder-press. In type revolving presses there are type-cylinders and impression-cylinders; the former on which the forms of type or stereotype plates are secured, revolve against the latter in the opposite direction. (d) The bore of a gun. (e) That part of a revolver which contains the chambers for the cartridges. (f) The central well around which a winding staircase is carried. (g) The body of a pump. (h) In a loom, a revolving part which receives the cards. In the Jacquard loom it is a square prism revolving on a horizontal axis. (i) In a carding-machine, a clothed barrel larger than an urchin or a doffer. See out under carding-machine. (j) In an electrical machine, a barrel of glass. (k) In ordnance, a wooden bucket in which a cartridge is carried from the magazine to the gun. E. H. Knight. (l) A garden- or field-roller. E. H. Knight. 3. In aug., a cylindrical or somewhat barrel-shaped stone, bearing a cuneiform inscription or a carved design, worn by the Babylonians, Assyrians, and kindred peoples as a seal and amulet. Great numbers of such cylinders have been found, and also of Phœnician imitations of them.—4. An old portable timepiece of the class of sun-dials.

By my chilindr it is prime of daye.
Chaucer, Shipman's Tale, l. 206.

5. [cap.] In conch., a genus of gastropods: same as Olivæ. Fabricius, 1823. Chargæ-cylinder, the part of the bore of a cannon occupied by the charge.—Double-acting cylinder, an engine-cylinder in which the stroke of the piston is effective in each direction, instead of only in one direction, as in the single-acting cylinder.—Forming-cylinder, in a paper-making machine, the cylinder on which the pulp is collected and formed into a soft web preparatory to drying and hardening.—Oblique cylinder. See oblique.—Oscillating cylinder, an engine-cylinder which rocks on trunnions, and the piston rod of which connects directly to the crank.—Vacant cylinder, the portion of the bore of a cannon left free in front of the charge.

Cylinder-bit (sil'in-dēr-bit), n. See half-round bit, under bit.

Cylinder-bore (sil'in-dēr-bōr), n. A gun the bore of which is of a uniform diameter throughout.

Cylinder-bore (sil'in-dēr-bōr), r. t. and i.; pret. and pp. cylindered, bor'd, pp. cylinder-boring. To bore, as a gun-barrel, in such a manner that the diameter of the bore is uniform throughout.

Cylinder-car (sil'in-dēr-kār), n. A hollow cylinder for carrying freight, with wheel-ends adapted to run on a railroad-track. The cylinder rolls with its load, thus doing away with the use of axles. E. H. Knight.

Cylinder-cock (sil'in-dēr-kok), n. A cock at the end of a steam-cylinder, through which water of condensation may be blown out, or through which steam may be blown in for warming up the cylinder. For the first purpose it is sometimes made automatic, and often called a safety cylinder-cock.

Cylinder-cover (sil'in-dēr-kuv'ēr), n. 1. A jacket or lagging placed about a steam-cylinder, to prevent radiation of heat.—2. In steam-engines, the cover secured by bolts to a flange round the top of a cylinder, so as to make it steam-tight.

Cylinder-desk (sil'in-dēr-deak), n. A writing-desk with a top somewhat cylindrical in shape, which can be pushed back to allow the desk to be used, or brought forward and locked. Also called a roll-top desk.

Cylinder-engine (sil'in-dēr-en'jin), n. In paper-making, a machine in which the pulp is formed in a sheet upon a cylinder and delivered as a web to the dryers.

Cylinder-escapement (sil'in-dēr-es-kāp'mēt), n. An escapement for watches invented by Graham, corresponding to the dead-beat escapement in clocks.

Cylinder-face (sil'in-dēr-fās), n. In engin., the flat part of a steam-cylinder on which a slide-valve moves.

Cylinder-gage (sil'in-dēr-gāj), n. A cast-iron hollow cylinder, from 3 to 5 calibers in length, accurately turned on the exterior, and used to verify the accuracy of the finished bore of a gun.

Cylinder-glass (sil'in-dēr-glās), n. Glass blown into the form of a cylinder, then split, and flattened into a sheet. The quality is superior to that of crown-glass. See broad glass, under broad.

Cylinder-grinder (sil'in-dēr-grin'dēr), n. A machine-tool with automatic traverse-feed for finishing cylindrical gages, such as those of gun-bore. E. H. Knight.

Cylinder-mill (sil'in-dēr-mil'), n. A grinding-mill in which the action of rollers is substituted for that of face-stones. E. H. Knight.

Cylinder-milling (sil'in-dēr-mil'ing), n. See milling.

Cylinder-port (sil'in-dēr-pōrt), n. One of the openings through which steam passes into the cylinder of a steam-engine.

Cylinder-powder (sil'in-dēr-pou'dēr), n. Gunpowder the charcoal for which is prepared by distillation in cylindrical iron retorts.

Cylinder-press (sil'in-dēr-pres), n. A printing-machine in which impression is made by a cylinder rotating over a sliding flat bed-plate which contains the form of types or plates. In the drum-cylinder press there is one cylinder of large size, making but one revolution to the forward and backward movement of the bed-plate; in other forms the cylinder makes two or more revolutions for each impression. In the step-cylinder press the cylinder stops its rotation soon after the impression is taken. The double-cylinder press has two cylinders, and prints an impression on the backward as well as the forward movement of the bed-plate. The name cylinder-press is technically applied only to presses or machines in which the impression-cylinder prints upon a flat surface. Printing-machines that are constructed to print from plates or types fastened on a cylinder are known distinctively as type-revolving presses, and specifically as rotary, web, or sun-and-planet presses.

Cylinder-small (sil'in-dēr-smāl), n. A small of the genus Cylindrella; a cylindrellid.

Cylinder-snake (sil'in-dēr-enāk), n. An ophiidian of the family Cylindrophidæ or Uropelidæ.

Cylinder-staff (sil'in-dēr-stāf), n. An instrument used in the inspection of ordnance to measure the length of the bore. Farrow, Mil. Encey.

Cylinder-tape (sil'in-dēr-tāp), n. In a cylinder printing-press, a tape running on the impression-cylinder, beneath the edge of the paper, to remove the sheet from the cylinder after impression. E. H. Knight.

Cylinder-wrench (sil'in-dēr-rench), n. A form of wrench adapted to grasp cylindrical rods or tubes; a pipe-wrench. E. H. Knight.

Cylindraceous (sil-in-drā'shius), a. [= F. cylindraceus; as cylinder + -aceous.] Somewhat or nearly cylindrical.

Cylindrella (sil-in-drel'ā), n. [NL., < L. cylindrus, cylinder, + dim. -ella.] A genus of gæophilous gastropods, of the family Cylindrellidæ, called cylinder-snails from the cylindrical shape of the shell. There are many species, of the warmer parts of America. Pfeiffer, 1840.

1. Cylindrella brevis. 2. Cylindrella elegans. (About twice natural size.)

Cylindrellid (sil-in-drel'id), n. A gastropod of the family Cylindrellidæ.

Cylindrellidæ (sil-in-drel'idē), n. pl. [NL., < Cylindrella + -idæ.] An American family of pulmonate gastropods, typified by the genus Cylindrella, the cylinder-snails.

The shell is cylindrical and many whorled, the last whorl usually detached from the rest and having a circular mouth. The animal has a thin jaw with oblique folds and the teeth of the radula are peculiar, the central being very narrow, the lateral having the internal and median cusps confluent, and the marginal resembling the lateral in miniature, or rudimentary. Over 200 species are known, most of which are inhabitants of the West Indian islands.

Cylindrenchyma (sil-in-dreng'ki-mā), n. [NL., < Gr. κύλινδρος, a cylinder, + χυμα, an infusion, < ἵκχω, infuse, < ἐν, in, + χύω, pour.] In bot., tissue composed of cylindrical cells, such as that of plants of the genus Conifera, and of many hairs, etc.

Cylindric, cylindrical (sil'in-drik, -dri-kāl), a. [= F. cylindrique = Sp. cilindrico = Pg. cilindrico = It. cilindrico, < NL. **cylindrus*, < Gr. κύλινδρος, cylindrical, < κύλιω, roll, < κύλις, roll.] Having the form of a cylinder, or partaking of its properties.—Cylindrical boiler, a steam-boiler made in the shape of a cylinder, simple in construction, and admitting of greater resistance to the lateral action of the causes of displacement than most others, although more expensive in the matter of fuel.—Cylindrical bone, in anat., a long bone, as a thigh-bone or humerus, with a more or less cylindrical hollow shaft of compact tissue, enclosing a medullary cavity, and having cancellous tissue at each end.—Cylindrical lens or mirror, a lens or mirror having one or two cylindrical surfaces. Cylindrical lenses are used in spectacles for the correction of astigmatism.—Cylindrical saw, a saw in the form of a cylinder, with the edge of the open end cut in saw teeth; a crown-saw, used for cutting staves, felloes, etc., and in surgery. Also called barrel-saw, drum-saw, tub-saw. See cut under crown-saw.—Cylindrical surface, a surface generated by a right line moving parallel to itself.—Cylindrical valve, a valve of cylindrical form on an oscillating axis, serving to open and close ports in the cylindrical case which forms its seat. E. H. Knight.—Cylindrical vaulting (properly semi-cylindrical vaulting), in arch., the most ancient mode of true vaulting. Also called a swagon, barrel, tunnel, or ovoid-vault. It is a plain half-cylinder, without either groins or ribs, or divided into bays by arcs doubleaux, which are usually of square or semicircular section.

Cylindrically (sil'in-dri-kāl-lī), adv. In the manner or shape of a cylinder.

Cylindricity (sil-in-dris'itī), n. [= F. cylindricité; as cylindric + -ity.] The character or state of being cylindrical; cylindrical form; as, imperfect cylindricity.

cylindricule (si-lin'dri-kül), n. [< NL. as if cylindriculus, dim. of L. cylindrus, a cylinder: see cylinder.] A small cylinder. Owen.

cylindriciform (si-lin'dri-för-m), a. [= F. cylindriciforme; < L. cylindrus, a cylinder, + forma, shape.] Having the form of a cylinder; shaped like a cylinder.

Cylindrostreus (si-lin-dro-s'trēs), n. pl. [NL., < L. cylindrus, a cylinder, + rostrum, beak.] In Blyth's system of classification (1849), a superfamily of his Halcyonidae, constituted by the kingfishers, rollers, and bee-eaters, or the families Alysiidae (or Alcedinidae), Coraciidae, and Meropidae.

cylindrocephalic (si-lin'drō-se-fal'ik or si-lin'drō-sef'-i-ik), a. [< cylindrocephaly + -ic.] Exhibiting or pertaining to cylindrocephaly.

cylindrocephaly (si-lin'drō-sef'-i-ē), n. [< Gr. κύλινδρος, cylinder, + κεφαλή, head.] A long cylindrical configuration of the skull.

cylindroconic, cylindroconical (si-lin-drō-kōn'ik, -i-kal), a. [< cylindric + conic, -al.] Shaped like a cylinder terminated by a cone.

cylindroconoidal (si-lin'drō-kō-noi'dal), a. [< cylindric + conoidal.] Shaped like a cylinder having a conoidal termination.

cylindrocylindrical (si-lin'drō-sil'in'dri-kal), a. [< cylindric + cylindrical.] In arch., formed by the intersection of one cylindrical vault with another of greater span and height, springing from the same level: said of an arch. See cross-vaulting.

cylindroid (sil'in-droid), n. and a. [= F. cylindroides = Pg. cylindroide, < Gr. κύλινδρος, a cylinder, + εἶδος, form.] 1. n. A solid body bounded by a cylindrical surface cut orthogonally by elliptical bases.—2. a. A conoidal cubic surface whose equation is  $z(x^2 + y^2) = 0$ . [No named by 'Ayley and Ball, 1871.]

II. a. Having the form of a cylinder with equal and parallel elliptical bases.

cylindroidal (sil'in-droi'dal), a. [< cylindroid + -al.] Resembling a cylinder; cylindroid.

During the embryonic condition of all vertebrates, the centre of the partition [between the cerebral and visceral tubes] is occupied by an elongated, cellular, cylindroidal mass—the notochord, or chorda dorsalis. Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 8

cylindroma (sil'in-drō'mā), n.; pl. cylindromata (-mā-tā). [NL., < Gr. κύλινδρος, a cylinder, + -μα, -ma.] In pathol., a name given to several kinds of tumors. (a) Sarcoma myxomatodes, a sarcoma in which the sarcoma cells have undergone in greater or less part mucous degeneration. (b) Angiosarcoma myxomatodes, a sarcoma in which the mucous degeneration affects the walls of the vessels and the tissue immediately about them. (c) Myxosarcoma, a simple combination of myxomatous and sarcomatous tissue. (d) Cylindroma carcinomatodes, a very rare carcinoma, characterized by the presence of homogeneous hyaline spherules in the cell nests. See carcinoma myxoma, sarcoma.

cylindromatous (sil'in-drom'a-tus), a. [< cylindroma + -ous.] Pertaining to or of the nature of a cylindroma.

cylindrometric (si-lin'drō-met'rik), a. [< Gr. κύλινδρος, a cylinder, + μέτρον, a measure.] Pertaining to a scale used in measuring cylinders.

cylindro-ogival (si-lin'drō-ō-jī'val), a. [= F. cylindro-ogival; as cylindric + ogival.] Having the form of a cylindrical body with an ogival head.

Oylindrophids (sil'in-drof'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., short for 'cylindrophididae, < 'cylindrophus (-drophid-) + -idae.] A family of harmless ophiurians or reptiles, typified by the genus Oylindrophis, without poison-fangs, with a very small head, the mouth not distensible, and the tail short and conical. They have a rudimentary pelvis, and a pair of anal spurs formed by the condensed epimeria of the rudimentary hind limbs; the teeth are small, and there are palatine teeth; the quadrate bone is fixed, and there is no distinct mastoid. Besides Oylindrophis, the family contains the genus Ophis or Tortrix, whence it is some times named Tortricidae. With the family Tropetidae it constitutes a suborder Anguillomata, or is brought under Ophiderontia with Tropetidae.

Oylindrophis (si-lin'drō-fis), n. [NL., < Gr. κύλινδρος, cylinder, + φῆρ, serpent.] A genus of serpents, giving name to the family Oylindrophidae. C. rufa is a Japanese species.

cyliz, n. See kyle.

Oyllocoraria (sil'e-kō-rā-rī-ā), n. pl. [NL.] One of the main divisions of the heteropterous family Phytocoridae, containing such genera as Hyalocoris.

Oyllene (si-lē'nē), n. [NL., < L. Oyllene, < Gr. οὔλην, the name of a mountain in Arcadia, Greece.] A genus of longicorn beetles, of the family Cerambycidae, which in the form of the body and the style of the markings have

(Drury) and C. robustus (Forst.), have a black body, banded with narrow transverse or oblique yellow lines, and red legs. The former lives in the hickory and appears in spring, while the latter infests the locust tree and appears in autumn. Both species are, in the larval state very destructive to the trees they inhabit. Harris, Ins. Inf. & Var., p. 103

cyma (si'mā), n.; pl. cymae (-mē). [NL. (cf. L. cyma, cume), a sprout, a hollow sphere, < Gr. κύμα, a wave, a swell, billow, a waved ogee or molding, < κύω, to be pregnant, lit. contain. See cyme] 1. In arch., a member or molding of the cornice, of which the profile is an ogee, or curve of contrary flexure. Of this molding there are two kinds: cyma recta, or Doric cyma (sometimes called h-n molding), which is concave at the top and convex at the bottom, and cyma reversa, or Ionian cyma which is convex at the top and concave at the bottom. Both kinds of the cyma are also called ogee. Also written cumi, cumi. 2. In bot., same as cyme.—3. [cap.] [NL.] Same as cyma, 2.

cynagraph (si'ma-grāf), n. [< Gr. κύμα, a waved molding, + γραφή, write.] A form of sculpture-copier or pantograph for tracing the outlines of objects in relief, particularly adapted for taking profiles of architectural moldings.

cynaphen (si'ma-fen), n. [Irreg. < Gr. κύμα, a wave, + φαίνω, show.] An apparatus in a telephone for receiving transmitted electric waves.

cymar, n. See amar.

cymatium (si-mā'shi-um), n.; pl. cymatia (-i). [L., < Gr. κύματιον, a waved molding, < κύμα(-), a wave, etc.: see cyma.] In arch., a cyma; a molding composed of the cyma.

Most of the capitals here are of the Corinthian order, and I took notice of the capitals of some pilasters, consisting of a cymatium two into, and fluted about a foot long, and under them a quarter round, adorned with eggs and dashes. Pausan., Description of the East, II. 11. 18

Cymatogaster (si-mā-tō-gas'tēr), n. [NL., < Gr. κύμα(-), ictus, + γαστήρ, belly.] A genus of surf-fishes, of the family Embiotridae. C. a. oregonus is an abundant fish of the Pacific coast of the United States, known as the skinner, minnow, and sparada of brass or bronze which, when struck together, produce a sharp, ringing sound: usually in the plural. Their are varies from little metallic castanets or finger-cymbals to large orchestral cymbals made to be used with the large or long drum. Instruments of the cymbal family are known from the earliest historic times. They are specially useful for rhythmic effect, though some experiments have been made with plates so shaped and used as to give tones of definite pitch.

cyma (sim'hu), n. [NL., < L. cyma, < Gr. κύμα, a boat: see cymbal, 'cymbalum.] 1. Pl. cyma (-bē). In the nomenclature of sponge-spicules, a boat-shaped microsclero or flesh-spicule. The cyma resembles in profile the letter C. The back or curve is called the keel or trough, the points are the prongs or proce. The prongs when lobed or alate are termed plata. Two varieties of the cyma are known as the pterocyma and oocyma. See these words. 2. [cap.] In conch., same as 'cymbium, 1.

cymbasform (sim'hē-för-m), a. Same as cymbiform.

cymbal (sim'bal), n. [ME. cymbale, cymbale, < OF. cymbale, F. cymbale = Sp. cimbalo = Pg. cymbalo = It. cimbalo, cembalo = D. cymbaal = G. Dan. cymbel = Sw. cymbal, < L. cymbalum, < Gr. κύμβαλον, a cymbal, < κύμβος, κύμβη, the hollow of a vessel, bowl, basin, cup, boat, knapsack, etc., = Skt. kumbhā, kumbhā, a pot, jar: see cumb2. (cf. chimel).] 1. One of a pair of concave plates of brass or bronze which, when struck together, produce a sharp, ringing sound: usually in the plural. Their are varies from little metallic castanets or finger-cymbals to large orchestral cymbals made to be used with the large or long drum. Instruments of the cymbal family are known from the earliest historic times. They are specially useful for rhythmic effect, though some experiments have been made with plates so shaped and used as to give tones of definite pitch.

I am become an sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal. 1 Cor. xiii. 1

In vain with cymbals' ring
They call the grisly king,
In dismal dance about the furnace blue.
Milton, Nativity, l. 208

2. In organ-building, a mixture-stop of very high pitch.—3. A musical instrument made of a piece of steel wire, in a triangular form, on which are passed several rings, which are touched and shifted along the triangle with an iron rod held in the right hand, while the cymbal is supported in the left by a cord. Also spelled symbal. Imp. Diet.

cymbal-doctor (sim'bal-dok'tor), n. A teacher whose instruction is like the tinkling of a cymbal. Compare 1 Cor. xiii. 1. [Rare.]

These petty glosses, no like the quibbles of a court sermon that we may safely reckon . . . that the hand of some household priest foliated them in, lest the world should forget how much he was a disciple of those cymbal-doctors. Milton, Rikonoklastes, vii

cymbaled, cymballed (sim'bald), a. [< cymbal + -ed.] Furnished with cymbals. [Rare.]

And highest among the statues, statue-like,
Between a cymbal d Miriam and a Jael
With Psycho's babe, was Ida watching us.

cymbaler, cymballer (sim'bal-er), n. [< cymbal + -er.] One who performs on a cymbal; a cymbalist. [Fallows.] cymbalist (sim'bal-ist), n. [< cymbal + -ist.] One who plays the cymbals.

cymballed, cymballer. See cymbaled, cymbaler.

cymbate (sim'bāt), a. [< L. cymba, a boat (see cymba), + -ate.] Boat-shaped, as that form of sponge-spicule called a cymba. Sollas.

cymbecephalic (sim'bē-se-fal'ik or sim'bē-sef'-i-ik), a. [< Gr. κύμβη, a hollow, + κεφαλή, head, + -ic.] Same as cymbecephalic. Dunghison.

Cymbidium (sim-bid'i-um), n. [NL., < Gr. κύμβη, κύμβη, a hollow, a cup, boat (see cymbal), + dim. -idium.] A genus of tropical terrestrial orchids, often having spikes of beautiful flowers, on which account several of them are favorites in the greenhouse. There are about 30 species, natives of eastern Asia, Australia, and Africa.

cymbiform (sim'bi-för-m), a. [< L. cymba, a boat, + forma, shape.] Boat-shaped; longer than broad, convex, and keeled like the bottom of a boat: applied to the elytra and other parts of insects, to seeds and leaves of plants, diatoms, and spores of fungi, and also to a bone of the foot usually called the scaphoid bone. See scaphoid. Also cymbaform.

Cymbirhynchus (sim-bi-ring'kus), n. [NL. (N. A. Vigors, 1831), also written 'cymbirhynchus, and more correctly 'cymborhynchus; < Gr. κύμβη, κύμβος, a cup, + ῥίγχω, snout, beak.] A notable genus of cecygomorphic birds, of the family Luridae: so called from the size and shape of the bill. The type is C. macrorhynchus, the blue-billed gaper, of Borneo, Sumatra, Java, etc.

Cymbium (sim'bi-um), n. [NL., < L. cymba, also cymba, a boat or skiff, < Gr. κύμβη, the hollow of a vessel, a boat, a knapsack: see cymbal and cumb2.] 1. A genus of gastropods, of the family Volutidae. The shell is ob-ovate, tumid, ventral and covered with a strong, cypidina, and the pillar low platoid. They are found on the At in an coast, and known as boat-shells. C. orthopa and C. proboide are examples. Also Cymba.

2. In entom., a genus of beetles, of the family Tropetidae. Scholtz, 1873.—3. [l. c.] In Gr. antiq., a form of vase of deep and upright shape, without foot or handles; a bowl.

cymblin, cymbling (sim'blin, -bling), n. Same as cymbin.

cymbocephalic (sim'bō-se-fal'ik or sim'bō-sef'-i-ik), a. [< Gr. κύμβη, bowl, + κεφαλή, head.] In cranol., a bilobed form of the skull.

Cymbulia (sim-bū'li-ā), n. [NL., < L. cymbula, a small boat, dim. of cymba, boat: see cymbal, and cf. cymba.] The typical genus of the family Cymbulidae, having a slipper-shaped shell pointed in front and square behind. C. proboscidea is an example.

Cymbulidae (sim-bū-lī'dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cymbula + -idae.] A family of thecosomatous pteropods. The animal is oval and has very large rounded fins, and there are three radular teeth in each transverse row, the median very wide and the lateral moderately wide and unicuspid; the shell has the form of a sandal, and is cartilaginous and mostly internal. Genera of this family are Cymbulia, Tiedemannia, and Halapachia.

The Cymbulidae are noticeable for their comparatively large size and the very peculiar shell which they secrete. In early life . . . they have a small, spiral, horny shell, but this becomes lost, and in its place the animal secretes a cartilaginous slipper-shaped shell, apparently possessing no more consistency than ordinary gelatine jelly. In this thick, transparent, flexible shell sits the mollusk, like the old woman in her shoe, paddling about by the large oval wings.

Stand. Nat. Hist., I. 3:8.

cyme (sim), n. [Also, as NL., cyma, < Gr. κύμα (> L. cyma), a young sprout, etc., same as cypha a wave, swell, etc.; see cyma.]

A. Cyme of house leek. B. of forget me not. From Fl. Mont. an. 1. The same as "Triste genre d. Bot. unique."

1. In bot.: (a) An inflorescence of the definite or determinate class; any form of inflorescence in which the primary axis bears a single terminal flower which develops first, the inflorescence being continued by secondary, tertiary, and other axes. The secondary and other axes may be given off on both sides of the primary axis (a dichotomous or bipartite cyme or dichasium) or in such a way as to cause the inflorescence to assume a helicoid or acropetal form (as in the forget me not). The term is applied especially to a broad and flattened compound form. (b) A panicle, the elongation of all the ramifications of which is arrested so that it has the appearance of an umbel.—2. In arch., same as cyma.

Also cima.
cymelet (sim'let), n. [ < cyme + -let.] Same as cymule.
cymene (sī'mēn), n. [ < cym(inum) + -ene.] A hydrocarbon ( $C_{10}H_{14}$ ) occurring in the volatile oil of Roman cumin, in camphor, in the oil of thyme, etc., and prepared by treating oil of turpentine with oil of vitriol. It is a colorless, strongly refracting liquid, and has a pleasant odor of lemon. Also cymol and camphogen.
cymic (sī'mik), a. [ < cym(inum) + -ic.] Pertaining to or derived from cymium or cumin.
—Cymic acid,  $C_{10}H_{12}O_2$ , a monobasic acid forming prismatic crystals insoluble in water.
cymiferous (sī-mīf'ē-rus), a. [ < NL. cyma, a cyme, + L. ferre = E. bear.] In bot., producing cymes.
Cymindis (sī-min'dis), n. [NL., < Gr. κίμινδης, an unidentified bird, described by Aristotle as haunting the mountains, black, of the size of a small hawk, long and slender in form.] 1. In entom., a genus of adephagous beetles, of the family Carabidae. Latreille, 1806.—2. In ornith., a genus of American hawks of small size, related to the kites. The tarsus is bare below, the notulae linear and oblique; the tarsi are bare, the bill cymobotrya (sī-mō-bot'ri-a), n. [NL., < Gr. κύμα, a young sprout (see cyma), + βότρυς, a cluster of grapes.] In bot., same as thyrsus.

cymogene (sī-mō-jēn), n. [ < Gr. κύμα (see cyma), + -γενής, producing; see cyma and -gen.] A mixture of very volatile hydrocarbons found in crude petroleum. When the crude petroleum is distilled, cymogene passes off as a gas at the usual temperature of the condenser, but by low temperature and compression it is reduced to a very volatile liquid having a specific gravity of .603–.678. It is used as a freeing mixture.

cymoid (sī'moid), a. [ < cyme + -oid.] Having the form of a cyme.
cymol (sī'mol), n. [ < L. cym(inum) + -ol.] Same as cymene.
cymophane (sī-mō-fān), n. [ < F. cymophane, < Gr. κύμα, a wave, + φανής, < φαίνω, show.] Chrysoberyll.

Hot white arm, that wore a twisted chain (inspired with an opal sheen) cymophane.
O. W. Holmes, The Mysterious Illness.

cymophaneous (sī-mōf'ā-nus), a. [As cymophane + -ous.] Having a wavy floating light; opalescent; chatoyant.

cymose, cymous (sī'mōs, sī'mus), a. [ < L. cymosus, full of shoots, < cyma, a shoot, sprout; see cyma.] Bearing a cyme; composed of cymes; pertaining to or resembling a cyme.

cymosely (sī'mō-sē-lē), adv. In a cymose manner: as, "branching cymosely," Farlow, Marine Alga, p. 103.

Cymothoa (sī-mōth'ō-a), n. [NL. (Fabricius, 1794), < Gr. κύμα, anything swollen, a wave, etc.,

Cymothoa fish, upper and lower view. 1 in. shows natural size.

+ θούα, quick, also pointed.] The typical genus of the family Cymothoidae. C. castrum is a common kind of fish-louse, parasitic upon many fishes, to which it clings tightly by means of its hooked legs.

Cymothoidae (sī-mō-thō'idē), n. pl. [NL., < Cymothoa + -idae.] A family of isopod crustaceans, of the group Eusipoda, typified by the genus Cymothoa, mostly parasitic on fish. The technical characters are a broad abdomen, with short segments and a scutate caudal plate, the posterior maxillipeds operulate, and the mouth-parts formed for biting or sucking. There are several genera besides Cymothoa as Serolis, Roa, Euraster, Crotalaria, and Cerastothoa. Also written Cymothoida.
cymous, a. See cymose.
Cymry, n. pl. See Cymry.

Cymric, Kymric (kim'rik), a. and n. [With accom. term. -ic, < W. Cymraeg, Welsh, Cymryg, the Welsh language, < Cymro, pl. Cymry, a Welshman, (Cymru, Wales; see Cymry.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Cymry and their kindred, the Cornishmen and Bretons.

He (Monsieur Edwards) . . . finds abundant traces of the physical type which he has established as the Cymric still subsisting in our population, and having descended from the old British possessors of our soil before the Saxon conquest.
M. Arnold, Study of Celtic Literature, III.

II. n. The language of the Cymry, or of the Cymric division of the Celtic race of Britain.
Cymry, Kymry (kim'ri), n. pl. [W. Cymry, pl. of Cymro, a Welshman; cf. Cymru, ML. Cambria, Wales. The origin of the name is unknown; some connect it with W. Cymmer, a confluence of waters; cf. aber, inver.] The name given to themselves by the Welsh. In its wider application the term is often applied to that division of the Celtic race which is more nearly akin with the Welsh, including also the Cornishmen and the Bretons or Armoricans, as distinguished from the Gadhelic division. Also written Cymry, Cymry.
Physical marks, such as the square head of the Gorman, the round head of the Gael, the oval head of the Cymry, which determine the type of a people.
M. Arnold, Study of Celtic Literature, III.

cymule (sī'mūl), n. [ < NL. cymula (cf. L. cymula, a tender sprout), dim. of cyma: see cyma, cyme.] In bot., a simple or diminutive cyme, by itself or forming part of a compound cyme. Also cymelet.
cymulose (sī'mū-lōs), a. [ < cymule + -ose.] Bearing or composed of cymules; pertaining to or resembling a cymule.

Cynalutrus (sī-nā-lū'trus), n. pl. [NL., < Cynalutrus + -inae.] A subfamily of Felidae, represented by the genus Cynalutrus: a synonym of Guopardinae (which see). Also written Cynailutrus.

Cynalutrus (sī-nā-lū'trus), n. [NL., < Gr. κύων (see cyn), a dog, + αλώπου, a cat.] A genus of dog-like cats, containing the cheetah or hunting leopard of India, C. jubata: a synonym of Guoparda (which see). Also written Cynailutrus. Wagler, 1830.

cynanche (sī-nang'hē), n. [LL. (> ult. E. equus nancy, quincy, q. v.), < Gr. κυνάγχη, dog-quincy, a kind of sore throat, also a dog-collar, < κύων (see cyn), a dog (= E. hound = L. canis, a dog), + ἀγχή, choke, suffocate.] A name of various diseases of the throat or windpipe, attended with inflammation, swelling, and difficulty of breathing and swallowing, as cynanche parotidæ, tonsillar, trachealis, etc.—Cynanche maligna. Same as angina maligna (which see, under angina).

Cynanchum (sī-nang'kum), n. [NL., < LL. cynanche, in reference to its poisonous qualities; see cynanche.] An asclepiadaceous genus of climbing plants, of the Mediterranean region and Australia, of about 20 species. The root of the European C. Vincetoxicum is emetic and purgative, and C. acutum is said to afford French or Montpellier scammony. See scammony, 1, and scammony.

cynanthropy (sī-nan'thrō-pi), n. [= F. cynanthropie, < Gr. κυνάνθρωπος, < κύων (see cyn), a dog-man, < άνθρωπος (see anthrop), man. Cf. lycanthropy.] A kind of madness in which the afflicted person imagines himself to be a dog, and imitates its voice and actions.

Cynara (sī-nā-rā), n. [NL., < Gr. κύναρα, a plant not determined, supposed to be either the dog-thorn (< κύων (see cyn), a dog) or κύναρα, the artichoke.] A small genus of composites, of the Mediterranean region, in many respects like the thistle, but having an involucre composed of thick, fleshy, spiny scales, and a remarkably thick, fleshy receptacle covered with numerous bristles. The two best-known species are the artichoke (C. scolymus) and the cardoon (C. cardunculus), cultivated as vegetables. The other species are troublesome weeds now widely naturalized upon the plains of extratropical South America. See cut under artichoke.

Cynaraceae (sī-nā-rā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < (Cynara + -aceae).] Name as Cynaroidae.

cynaraceous (sī-nā-rā'shē-us), a. [ < Cynara + -aceous.] Belonging to or resembling the Cynaraceae or Cynaroidae.

cynarctomachy (sī-nārk-tom'a-ki), n. [ < Gr. κύων (see cyn), a dog, + άρκτος, a bear, + μαχη, a fight.] Bear-baiting with a dog: a humorous word invented by Butler.

Some occult design doth lie
In bloody cynarctomachy
S. Butler, Hudibras, I. l. 752

cynareous (sī-nā-rē-us), a. [ < (Cynara + -eous).] Cynareous.

cynaroid (sī-nā-rōid), a. [ < (Cynara + -oid).] Same as cynareous.

Cynaroides (sī-nā-rōi'dē-s), n. pl. [NL., < (Cynara + -oides).] A tribe of the natural order Compositae, of which the genus Cynara is the type, distinguished by having the anthers conspicuously caudate, the flowers all hermaphrodite with tubular corollas and setose pappus, and the leaves usually prickly. The largest genera are Vicinus and Centaura. Also Cynaraceae. See Cynara.

cynobot (A.-S. pron. kū'ne-bōt), n. [AS., < cyn (in comp.), king, + bōt, fine, boot: see king and boot.] In Anglo-Saxon law, that part of the fine imposed on the murderer of a king which was paid to the community, as distinguished from the wergild paid to the king's kin.

By the Mercian law it (wergild payable to the king's kin on his violent death) was 7200 shillings. . . . A fine of equal amount, the cynobot, was at the same time due to his people.
Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 50.

cynogetic (sī-nō-jet'ik), a. [= F. cynogétique = Sp. cinegético, < Gr. κυνήτιος, pertaining to hunting, < κυνήτις, a hunter, < κύων (see cyn), a dog, + γενήτις, lead.] Concerning or having to do with hunting or cynogetics. [Rare.]

Jacques du Fouilleux, the celebrated hunter and cynogetic writer of the sixteenth century.
N. and Q., 7th ser., IV. 66.

cynogeticus (sī-nō-jet'iks), n. [ < L. cynogeticus, < Gr. κυνήτιος, neut. pl. of κυνήτις, pertaining to hunting; see cynogetic and -ics.] The art of hunting with dogs. [Rare.]

There are extant . . . in Greek four books on cynogeticus, or venation.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., I. 2.

Cayenne Hawk Cymindis cayennensis is slender and much hooked at the end, the tail is rounded; and the wings are short. The genus was named by Cuvier, 1817, on the Cayenne hawk, C. cayennensis.

cyminum (sī-mī-num), n. [L., also cuminum, < cumin, q. v.] Same as cumin.

cymula, n. See cymule.

cymobotryose (sī-mō-bot'ri-ōs), a. [As cymobotrya + -ose.] In bot., same as thyrsoid.

Common Weakfish or Spouttongue (Cynoscion regalis)

cyperologist (si-pə-rōl'ō-jist), n. [< NL. Cyperus, a. v., + Gr. -λογία (see -ology) + -ist.]

In bot., a writer or an authority upon the genus Cyperus.

Cyperus (si-pr'us), n. [NL. (L. cyperus, cyperus), < Gr. κύπερος (Herodotus), an aromatic plant used in embalming, prob. same word as κύπερος, name of a sweet-smelling marsh-plant, also sedge, gladiolus. The L. name appears in F. as cyperus, and in E. as cyperus (Gerard), cyperus (Cotgrave): see cyperus.] A genus of plants, natural order Cyperaceae, of about 700 species, very widely distributed, but especially abundant in tropical and subtropical regions. There are about 50 species in the United States. They are annuals or perennials, with triangular naked culms usually bearing an irregular umbel of flattened spikelets. A few of the species, as C. aculeatus and C. bulbosus, have tuberous roots which are used for food. C. rotundus, known as nutgrass, and C. phymatodes multiply rapidly by slender tuberiferous rootstocks, and become pests in cultivated fields. The tubers of the former yield an oil, which is much used in upper India as a perfume.

cyphel (si-fel'), n. Same as cyphella.

cyphella (si-fel'), n. [NL., < Gr. κύπελλα, the hollow of the ear, akin to κύπελλον, a drinking-vessel, < κύψω, the hollow of a vessel: see cyphal.] 1. Pl. cyphella (-s). A cup-like pit or depression on the under surface of the thallus in certain lichens. The color is usually white or yellow. Also cyphel.—2. [cap.] A genus of hymenomycetous fungi, belonging to the family Auriculariinae. The hymenium is inferior and confluent with the pileus, and the latter is somewhat cup shaped and frequently pendulous.

cyphellaform (si-fel'-fōrm), a. [Cyphella, q. v., + L. forma, shape.] Cup-shaped.

cyphellate (si-fel'-at), a. [Cyphella + -ate.] In bot., provided with cyphellae.

cypher, n. and v. See cypher.

cyphi, n. Plural of cyphus.

Cyphomandra (si-fō-man'drā), n. [NL. (so called from the thickened and curved connective), < Gr. κύψω, hump, + ανδρ, man (mod. bot. stamen).] A solanaceous genus, of South America, closely allied to Nolana, comprising about 20 species of small trees or shrubs.

(C. betacea, the tree tomato of Peru, is cultivated in subtropical countries for its large pear-shaped, orange-colored fruit, which is used in the same way as the tomato.)

Cyphon (si-fon'), n. [NL., < Gr. κύψω, a crooked piece of wood, < κύφω, bent, stooping: see cyphus.] A genus of beetles, of the family Danacidae, or giving name to a family (Cyphonidae). Paykull, 1798.

cyphonautae (si-fō-nā-tāe), n.; pl. cyphonautae. [NL., < Gr. κύψω, bent, stooping, + ναυτης, sailor.] The larva of a gymnomelous polyzoan of the genus Membranipora: formerly mistaken for a distinct organism, and referred to a special genus of rotifers by Ehrenberg.

Other larval forms [of Polyzoa], which are apparently of a very different structure, . . . e. g. Cyphonautae, a larva which is found in all seas, and is, according to Schneider, the larva of Membranipora pilosa.

(Cyphus, Zoology (trans), II 78)

Cyphonidae (si-fon'-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyphon + -idae.] A family of serricorn maledermatous Coleoptera or beetles, related to the Cedriidae. They are of small size, with rather soft, depressed, hemispherical or ovate bodies, and furcate labial palps. They are beetles of dull colors, found on plants in damp situations, flying and running with agility. The family is also called Basidiidae.

cyphonism (si-fō-nizm), n. [Cyphus, q. v., + -ism, a pillory in which slaves and criminals were fastened by the neck.] A form of punishment practised in antiquity, supposed by some to have consisted in besmearing the criminal with honey, and then exposing him to insects, and by others to have been identical with the Chinese caangue. See caangue.

Cyphophthalmidae (si-fōf-thal'-mi-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyphophthalmus + -idae.] A family of truestee arachnids, named from the genus Cyphophthalmus, having stalked eyes: synonymous with Sironidae (which see).

Cyphophthalmus (si-fōf-thal'-mus), n. [NL., < Gr. κύψω, bent, + ὄφθαλμος, eye.] A genus of harvest-spiders? a synonym of Siro.

cyphosis (si-fō-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. κύφω, a being humpbacked, < κύφωσις, be humpbacked, < κύψω, humpbacked, bent forward, < κύρνω, bend.] In pathol., a curvature of the spine, convex backward. Usually written kyphosis.

Cyphus (si-pr'us), n. [NL., appar. < Gr. κύψω, bent, curved, < κύρνω, bend.] 1. A genus of weevils, of the family Cyrtolichidae. Schönherr, 1838.—2. A genus of South American barbets. The type is C. macrodactylus. Also Cyphus. Spix, 1824.

cyphus, n. See cyphus.

Cypraea (si-pr'ē), n. [NL., with allusion to Cypra, Venus: see Cyprina.] A genus of gas-tropoda, type of the family Cypridae; the cowries. Cypraea moneta is the money-cowry, used in many parts of the world as a circulating medium. C. annulus is used by the Pacific islanders for barter, ornament, and other purposes. C. tigris is a handsome species, a frequent mantle-ornament. See cowry. Also Cypra.

cypræid (si-pr'ē-id), n. A gastropod of the family Cypridae.

Cypræidae (si-pr'ē-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cypraea + -idae.] A family of gastropodous mollusks, the cowries. They have a ventricose, convoluted, enameled shell, with concealed suture and a long and narrow aperture with crenulated lips, usually late at each end, no operculum; a broad foot, and a lobate mantle. The leading genera are Cypraea (to which the family is now often restricted), Oculina (or Oculina), and Pedicularia. Also Cypræidae, Cypræa, Cypræidæ.

cypræiform (si-pr'ē-i-fōrm), a. [Cypraea, q. v., + L. forma, form.] Having the form or characters of Cypraea.

cypræoid (si-pr'ē-oid), a. and n. [Cypraea + -oid.] 1. a. Of or relating to the Cypræidae.

II. n. A cypræid.

cy-præ (sē-prā'), [OF., so near, as near: cy, < (see ci-dent); præ, mod. F. præ = It. press, near, < L. pressus, pressed (close): see press.] In lan., as near as practicable. Doctrine of cy-præ, an equitable doctrine (applicable only to cases of trusts or charties) which, in place of an illegal or impossible condition, limitation, or object, allows the nearest practicable one to be substituted. Thus, in some of the United States when a charity necessarily ceases through the lapse of its object—as, for instance, one for the emancipation of slaves—the courts turn the property over to a similar charity rather than that it should revert to the heirs.

cypræa (si-pr'ē), n. and a. [Early mod. E. also cypræus, cypræan: < ME. cypræa, cypræan, cypræse, cypræin, < OF. cypræa, F. cyprée = Pr. cyprée = Sp. cyprís = Pg. cyprate = It. cypræo = D. cyprís = G. cypræus = Dan. cypræ = Sw. cypræus, < LL. cypræus, classical L. cypræus, rarely cypræus, < Gr. κύπριος, Attic κύπριος, the cypræa-tree, common in Greece. A different word and tree from cyprus, a tree of Cyprus, though formerly confused with it; ME. cypræ-tree, later cyprus (Cotgrave), cypræus, in form < L. cyprus: see cyprus.] 1. n. 1. In bot. (a) The popular name of coniferous trees of the genus Cypræus. The common cypræa of south ern Europe is C. sempervirens, of which there are two forms, one with upright appressed branches like a Lombardy poplar, the other a flat topped tree with horizontal branches. The wood is much used in carpentry. C. macrocarpa, the Monterey cypræa of California, is a fine ornamental tree, and is frequently cultivated.

He beweth him down cedars, and taketh the cypræa and the oak. Isa. xlv 14

(b) A name given to other coniferous trees nearly allied to the true cypræes. Such are Lawson's cypræa, Chamaecyparis Lawsoniana and the yellow or Sitka cypræa, C. Nuttalliana, of the Pacific coast of North America, both valuable timber-trees and largely cultivated for ornament, the bald, deciduous, black swamp red, or white cypræa of the Atlantic States, Taxodium distichum, a large timber tree of which the wood varies much in color; the desert-cypræa of Australia, Freycinetia rubra, and the foliage golden cypræa, Banksia ornata, of Japan, with yellow foliage (c) One of various plants so named from a fancied resemblance to the true cypræa, as the standing cypræa, Gilia coronopifolia, a tall, slender, polemoniaceous herb, with divided leaves and scarlet flowers, and the Belvedere, broom-, or summer cypræa, a tall rhom-podaceous plant, Kochia scoparia, sometimes cultivated.—2. An emblem of mourning for the dead, cypræa-branches having been anciently used at funerals.

Immur'd in cypræe shades, a nocifer dwells.

Milton, Comus, l. 521.

cypræa (si-pr'ē), n. and a. [First in Shak-speare's time, spelled cypræa, cypræse, cypræe, cypræ; origin unknown; possibly (since it is a book-word) from some misreading of OF. cypræe, cypræe, cypræe: see cypræe and cypræe.] 1. a. A thin transparent black or white stuff; a kind of crape.

Shadow their glory, as a milliner's wife does her wrought stomacher, with a snaky lawn, or a black cypræa!

B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, l. 2.

A beauty artificially covered with a thin cloud of Cypræa, transmits its light; hence, to the eye, made more greedy and apprehensive by that imperfect and weak restraint.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1838), l. 21.

II. a. Made of or resembling cypræa.—Cypræe cat, a tabby cat

While discussing the merits of a new kitten recently with a lady from Norwich, she described its colour as Cypræa—dark grey, with black stripes and markings. I took an opportunity of asking a gentleman who had lived in Norfolk as to the colour of the kitten, and his reply was,

"In Norfolk we should call it Cypræa"

N and Q, 7th ser, IV. 220.

Cypræa damask, a rich silk cloth made in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries with cypræa gold.—Cypræa gold, gold thread so made that the surface of the metal is brilliant like metal wire. See cypræa damask, and gold thread, under thread. Rock, Textile Fabrics.—Cypræa lawn, Sam as I

Sabbat stole of Cypræa lawn

cypræa (si-pr'ē), n. [Also spelled cypræe, cypræ, altered, by confusion with cypræa, from L. cypræa, galingale: see cypræa.] The English galingale, Cypræa longus: called succet cypræa from its aromatic roots. Also cypræa-root.

cypræa-knee (si-pr'ē-nē), n. One of the large, hollow, conical excrescences which rise from the roots of the swamp-cypræa, Taxodium distichum. The cause or reason of their growth is unknown. They are frequently used as beehives by the negroes.

cypræa-moss (si-pr'ē-mōs), n. The club-moss, Lycopodium alpinum.

cypræa-root (si-pr'ē-rōt), n. Same as cypræa.

cypræa-vine (si-pr'ē-vin), n. A Mexican convolvulaceous climber, Ipomoea Quamoclit, with finely parted leaves and bright-scarlet or white flowers. It is frequently cultivated.

Cypræan (si-pr'ē-an), a. and n. [Cypræa, < Gr. κύπριος, pertaining to Cyprus, L. Cypræa, famous for its worship of Venus (Aphrodite); hence fem., L. Cypræa (also Cypræa, < Gr. κύπρις), Venus (Aphrodite): see cypræa.] 1. a. 1. Same as cypræa.—2. Pertaining to Aphrodite or Venus; hence, lewd; wanton.

Is this that jolly god whose Cypræan bow

Has shot so many flaming darts?

Quarles, Rubens, II a.

II. n. 1. Same as Cypræa.—2. A lewd woman; a courtesan; a strumpet.

Cypræicardia (si-pr'ē-kār'-di-g), n. [NL., as Cypræa, q. v., + Gr. καρδία = F. heart.]

A genus of conchiferous or lamelli-branch mollusks, of the family Cypræidae, having an oblong shell, with two cardinal teeth and a lateral tooth on each side of the hinge.

Cypræidæ (si-pr'ē-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cypræa (Cypræid-) + -æda.] A group of ostracoid crustaceans: synonymous with Chitracella (which see).

Cypraea tigris

Fruiting Branch of Cyphomandra betacea

Cypræa (Cypræus) sempervirens, var. fastigiata.

Cyprididæ (si-prid-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < ('ypris (Cyprid-) + -idæ.) A family of ostracod entomostracous crustaceans, of the order Ostracoda. The technical characters are: a double median eye, no heart, a pair of light, strong valves or shells, not indented for the passage of the antennæ; the anterior antennæ usually 7 jointed and beset with long setæ, the posterior antennæ usually 8 jointed, simple, and pediform; two pairs of legs, and the abdomen furcate, with hooked setæ. The second pair of antennæ serve as locomotor and prehensile organs. There are several genera (chiefly fresh water forms, as Cypris, Notodromus, Bairdia, etc.).

Cypridina (sip-ri-di-nā), n. [NL., < ('ypris (Cyprid-) + -ina.) The typical genus of ostracod crustaceans of the family Cyprididæ. (C. mediterranea is an example.)

Cypridinidæ (sip-ri-di-ni-dē), n. pl. [NL., < ('ypridina + -idæ.) A family of ostracod entomostracous crustaceans, of the order Ostracoda. The technical characters are: a heart with dorsal aspect; large paired lateral, compound stalked eyes, the shells of valves beaked, and deeply indented for the passage of the antennæ; the anterior antennæ in 7 and setose; the posterior antennæ bifurcate, serving as swimming-organs; the manducator apparatus abortive, the palp long, pediform, and 5 jointed, and the abdomen ending in a lamella armed with spines and hooks. They are exclusively marine organisms. Cypridina and Astroropis are the principal genera.

Cyprina (si-prī-nā), n. [NL. Cf. Cyprinus.] A genus of siphonate bivalve mollusks, of the family Isocardidæ, or typical of a family (Cyprinidæ), having two cardinal teeth and a lateral tooth on each valve. C. islandica is a large species of the North Atlantic. Also Cyprine.

Cyprinacea (sip-ri-nā-se-an), n. pl. [NL., < ('yprina + -acea.) A superfamily of mollusks, represented by the Cyprinidæ and related families. See Cyprinidæ<sup>2</sup>.

cyprinacean (sip-ri-nā-se-an), a. and n. [Cyprinacea + -an.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Cyprinacea.

II. n. One of the Cyprinacea.

cyprino<sup>1</sup> (sip'rin), a. [Cyprinus.] In ichth., cyprinoid; carp-like; pertaining to fishes of the genus Cyprinus or family Cyprinidæ.

cyprino<sup>2</sup> (sip'rin), a. [Short for Cyprinus, < LL. Cyprinus, L. Cyprinus, < Gr. κυπρινος, of the cyprus, < κυπρια, cyprus: see cypriss.] Of or belonging to the cyprus.

cyprino<sup>3</sup> (sip'rin), n. [LL. Cyprinus, Cyprinus, of copper, < Cyprum, copper: see copper.] A variety of vesuvianite or idocrase, of a blue tint, which is supposed to be due to the presence of copper.

Cyprinidæ<sup>1</sup> (si-prin-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < ('yprinus + -idæ.) A family of fresh-water fishes, typified by the genus Cyprinus (the carp), of varying limits with different authors. (a) In Cuvier's system, the first family of Malacocephali suborder, having a slightly cleft mouth with weak and generally toothless jaws, the border of the mouth being formed by the intermaxillaries and the trifid maxillaries of the jaws containing the deeply indented pharyngeals; a small number of branchial rays; the body scaly; and no adipose dorsal fin. (b) In Günther's system, a family of phoscomous fishes, with body generally covered with scales; head naked, margin of upper jaw formed by the intermaxillaries; mouth toothless; lower pharyngeal bones well developed, falciform and parallel with the branchial arches, and provided with teeth in two or three series; air-bladder large, divided into an anterior and a posterior portion by a constriction, or into a right and a left portion enclosed in an osseous capsule (absent in Hemibarbus); and ovarian sacs closed. (c) In Gill's system, a family of eventronathous fishes, with the margin of the upper jaw formed by the intermaxillaries alone, the pharyngeal teeth few, and three basal branchial rays. Even with its narrow limits, it is the largest family of fishes, containing nearly 1,000 species, which by some are referred to more than 200 genera, but by others to much fewer. Very numerous representatives occur in the fresh waters of North America, Europe, and Asia, and fewer in those of Africa, where they have apparently found their way in later Tertiary times. They are absent from the streams of South America, Australia, and all the islands of the Pacific ocean except those of the East Indian archipelago. About 250 species have been found in the United States, most of which are very small. In Europe and Asia species contribute largely to the food-supply of the people, but in America very few are of any economical importance. The most valuable is the true carp, Cyprinus carpio, which has been introduced and is now largely cultivated in the United States. Another species widely dispersed is the ornamental goldfish, Carassius (or Cyprinus) auratus. Dace, roach, chub, shiner, and minnow are names applied to various species. See cuts under carp and goldfish.

Cyprinidæ<sup>2</sup> (si-prin-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < ('yprina + -idæ.) In roch., a family of siphonate bivalve mollusks, taking name from the genus Cyprina. The technical characters are: a regular, equi-valve, oval shell, with thick, strong epidermis; 1-3 principal cardinal teeth; a simple pallial line; and the edges of the mantle fused to form two siphonal openings. Also called Isocardidæ. See cut under Cyprina.

cypriniform (si-prin-i-fōrm), a. [Cyprinus, q. v., + L. forma, shape.] In form resembling a cyprinoid fish; carp-like.

Cyprinina (sip-ri-ni-nā), n. pl. [NL., < ('yprinus + -ina.) In Günther's system, the second group of Cyprinidæ. The technical characters are: an air-bladder divided into an anterior and a posterior portion (not enclosed in an osseous capsule); pharyngeal teeth in single, double, or triple series, and few in number, the outer series not containing more than 7; the anal fin very short, with 5 or 6, exceptionally 7, branched rays; a lateral line running along the middle of the tail; and the dorsal fin opposite to the ventrals.

Cyprinodon (si-prin-ō-don), n. [NL., < Gr. κυπρινος, a carp, + ὄν, Ionic form of ὄδω (ὄδωρ) = E. tooth.] The typical genus of the family Cyprinodontidæ. La-cépède, 1803.

Cyprinodon variegatus

maintaining to or having the characters of the Cyprinodontidæ.

II. n. Same as cyprinodontid. cyprinodontid (si-prin-ō-don-tid), n. A fish of the family Cyprinodontidæ.

Cyprinodontidæ (si-prin-ō-don-ti-lē), n. pl. [NL., < ('yprinodon(-) + -idæ.) A family of haplousomous fishes, typified by the genus Cyprinodon. The head and body are covered with scales, the margin of the upper jaws is formed by the intermaxillaries only, there are teeth in both jaws; the upper and lower pharyngeals have cardiform teeth; the dorsal fin is situated on the hinder half of the body; the stomach is without a blind sac, and the pyloric appendages are absent. Many of them are known as killifishes, mosquitofishes, etc. — Cyprinodontidæ carnivoræ, in Günther's classification of fishes, the first group of Cyprinodontidæ, characterized by the bones of each mandibular being firmly united, and the intestinal tract short or but little convoluted. Cyprinodontidæ limnophagæ, in Günther's classification of fishes, a group of Cyprinodontidæ, characterized by the bones of each mandibular not being united (the dentary being movable), and the intestinal canal with numerous convolutions. The sexes are differentiated.

Cyprinodontina (si-prin-ō-don-ti-nā), n. pl. [NL., < ('yprinodon(-) + -ina.) In Günther's classification of fishes, a subgroup of Cyprinodontidæ carnivoræ, in which the anal fin of the male is not modified into an intromittent organ, and the teeth are incisor-like and notched.

cyprinodontoid (si-prin-ō-don-toid), a. and n. [Cyprinodon (-) + -oid.] I. a. Same as cyprinodont.

II. n. Same as cyprinodontid.

cyprinoid (sip'ri-noid), a. and n. I. a. Carp-like; cyprine; pertaining to or having the characters of the Cyprinoidæ.

II. n. A carp or carp-like fish; a fish of cyprinoid character; one of the Cyprinoidæ.

Cyprinoidæ (sip-ri-noi-dē), n. pl. [NL., < ('yprinus + -oidæ.) A superfamily of plectro-spondylous fishes, embracing the families Cyprinidæ (carps, etc.), Homalopteridæ (East Indian fishes), Catostomidæ (suckers), and Cobitidæ (loaches).

cyprinoidæan (sip-ri-noi-dē-an), a. and n. [Cyprinoidæ + -an.] I. a. Of cyprinoid character; cyprinoid.

II. n. One of the Cyprinoidæ.

Cyprinus (si-prī-nus), n. [NL., < L. Cyprinus, < Gr. κυπρινος, a carp.] The typical genus of the family Cyprinidæ; the carps proper. The genus has varied within wide limits. By Linnaeus and the old authors all the eventronathous fishes, as cyprinids, catostomids, and cobitids, with some others, were included. It gradually underwent delimitation by many zoologists, and is now generally restricted to the carp. The common cultivated carp is C. carpio, of which there are many varieties. C. auratus is the common goldfish, but it belongs properly to a very distinct genus, Carassius. See carp.

Cypriot (sip'ri-ot), n. See Cypriotæ.

Cypriotæ (sip'ri-ot), n. and a. [= F. Cypriot, Cypriot = It. Cipriotto, < L. Cyprus, Cypricus, < Cyprus, Cyprus.] I. n. 1. An inhabitant of Cyprus, a large island lying in the eastern part of the Mediterranean, and forming part of the Turkish empire, though occupied and administered by Great Britain since 1878; specifically, one of the primitive race of inhabitants, Greek in language and affinity. — 2. The Greek dialect of Cyprus.

II. a. Of or belonging to the island of Cyprus. — Cypriotæ alphabet, a syllabic character, of disputed origin, used anciently for writing the Cypriotæ Greek dialect. — Cypriotæ pottery, a class of pottery found in the island of Cyprus; specifically, the ancient vessels, of a somewhat coarse baked clay, found generally in tombs, and showing in their form and in their decoration, whether geometric or derived from animal or vegetable types, etc., a close affiliation to important series of pottery made on the mainland of Greece and Asia, and in other islands, as Rhodes and Thera. This pottery is important for the tracing of connecting links between the art of Greece and that of other lands, as, for instance, in its exhibition of the gradual modification and Hellenization of the Egyptian lotus as a decorative motive.

Also Cyprian.

cypridin (sip-ri-pē-din), n. [Cypridum + -in.] The precipitate formed when water is added to a strong tincture prepared from the roots of plants of the genus Cypridum.

Cypridium (sip-ri-pē-di-um), n. [NL., < Gr. κύπρις, Aphrodite (see Cyprina), + νιδιον, a plain, < νιδος, the ground, akin to νός (νόσ) = E. foot.] A genus of orchids, remarkable for having the two lateral anthers perfect, while the third forms a dilated fleshy appendage above the stigma. The lip is large and sacrate or somewhat slipper-shaped when the common name lady's slipper and (in the United States) moorwort-flower. There are about 40 species, ranging from the tropics to the colder temperate regions of the northern hemisphere. A single species, C. Calceola, is rarely found in Great Britain; 10 species occur in the United States; but the larger number belong to the tropics of America. The tropical species generally have thick, veinless leaves; and several of them are in frequent cultivation in greenhouses, where their forms have been largely increased in number by hybridization.

Cypris (si'pris), n. [NL., < L. Cypris, < Gr. κύπρις, Venus (Aphrodite): see Cyprina.] The typical genus of ostracodes, of the family Cyprididæ.

The species are among the numerous and varied forms of minute fresh-water crustaceans known as water-bees, swarming in ditches, pools, and other stagnant waters. Their shells abound in a fossil state, in fresh-water strata, from the Carboniferous formation upward.

Cyprus<sup>1</sup> (si'prus), n. [L., < Gr. κύπρος, a tree growing in Cyprus, supposed to be the same as the Heb. gopher, < קפר, Cyprus. A different word and tree from Cyprus (L. Cyprus), with which in E. it has been confused: see Cyprus<sup>2</sup>.] The Latin name of a tree, Laurus alba, the common henna, growing in Cyprus and Egypt, yielding a fragrant oil.

A Species of Cypris, highly magnified.

A. I. I., antennæ and anterior; M. I. I., mandibles and maxillæ; A. I. I., mandibular appendages; P. I. I., thoracic members; S. I. I., mandibular palpi; C. I. I., caudal end; E. I. I., eye.

cyprus-bird (si'prae-bird), n. The blackcap, or European black-capped warbler, Sylvia or Curruca atricapilla.

cyprusite (si'pru-sit), n. [Irreg. < Cyprus + -ite.] An iron sulphate occurring in yellow incrustations in western Cyprus.

Cyprus turpentine. See Umbra turpentine, under Umbra.

cyssa (sip'se-lā), n.; pl. cyssae (-lā). [NL., < Gr. κύσση, any hollow vessel, the hollow of the ear (cf. cyphella), prob. akin to κύπελλον, a cup: see cup.] In bot., an achene with an adnate calyx, as in the Compositae.

Cypseli (sip'se-li), n. pl. [NL., pl. of L. cypselus, a swift: see Cypselus.] A superfamily group of picarian birds, approximately equal to the Macrochiroes of Nitzsch, and now usually consisting of the three families Cypselidae, Trochilidae, and Caprimulgidae: same as Cypseloides, Cypseliformes, or Cypselomorpha.

Cypselidae (sip'se-li-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cypselus + -idae.] A family of fissirostral macrochiran non-passerine birds; the swifts. The technical characters are: a very small, deeply cleft, unbristled bill, with exposed nostrils; extremely long pointed wings, with graduated primaries and short secondaries; small weak feet, unfitted for progression, frequently with an abnormal ratio of the phalanges; enormously developed salivary glands; the sternum entire behind; the furculum U-shaped; no caeca; the leg-muscles anomalous; and several narrowly oval, white eggs. The swifts are a well-marked family of from 8 to 8 genera and about 50 species, resembling swallows, and often so misnamed. They are divided into two subfamilies, Cypselinae and Chaeturae. See cuts under Chaetura and Cypselus.

cypseliform (sip'se-li-form), a. [NL., < Cypselus + -formis, < L. cypselus, a swift, + forma, shape.] Having the form or structure of a swift; resembling the Cypselidae. Also cypselomorphic.

Cypseliformes (sip'se-li-fôr-mêz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of cypseliformis: see cypseliform.] A superfamily of macrochiran non-passerine birds, containing the swifts, gnatcatchers, and humming-birds; the long-handed series of picarian birds: nearly the same as the Macrochiroes, and the same as the Cypseloides of Blyth and Cypselomorpha of Huxley. The syrinx has not more than one pair of intrinsic muscles, the palate is agilligathous, the oil gland is nude; the legs are anomalous; the sternum is broad, deeply keeled, entire or notched behind; the tail has 10 rectrices, the distal segments of the wing are greatly elongated in comparison with the proximal one, and the pinnion bears 10 rapidly graduated flight feathers, producing a long, pointed wing; the feet are small, scarcely serviceable for progression, with variously modified digits, sometimes of abnormal ratio of phalanges, but neither syndactyl nor zygodactyl, and the hind toe is elevated or reversed in some forms, in which also the front toes may be semi-palmate. The bill shows two diverse types, being tenuirostral in the humming-birds and fissirostral in the swifts and gnatcatchers. The group is contrasted among picarian birds with the Cuculiformes and the Perniformes.

Cypselinus (sip'se-li-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Cypselus + -inus.] A subfamily of Cypselidae; the typical swifts. The ratio of the phalanges is abnormal, all the front toes being 3 jointed, with very short basal phalanges; the hallux is reversed or lateral; and the feet are more or less completely feathered. It contains about 25 species, chiefly of the genus Cypselus, and mostly of the old world. Panyptila is the leading American form. See cut under Cypselus.

cypseline (sip'se-lin), a. [NL., < Cypselus + -inus.] Swift-like; having the characters of a swift; pertaining to the family Cypselidae or genus Cypselus.

cypseloid (sip'se-loid), a. [NL., < Cypselus, a swift, + oides, form.] Resembling a swift; cypseliform; specifically, pertaining to the superfamily Cypseloides.

Cypseloides (sip'se-loi-dēs), n. [NL.: see cypseloid.] 1. A genus of swifts, of the family Cypselidae and subfamily Chaeturae, having the phalanges of the toes normal, the tarsi naked, and the tail forked, its feathers not mucronate. — 2. [Used as a plural.] In Blyth's classification of birds (1846), a series or superfamily of his Streptopores heterodactyli, consisting of the podargues and moth-hunters, or Podargidae and Caprimulgidae, grouped together under the name Parvirostres, and of the swifts and humming-birds, Cypselidae and Trochilidae, grouped together under the name Tenuirostres.

cypselomorph (sip'se-lō-môr-f), n. One of the Cypselomorphae.

Cypselomorpha (sip'se-lō-môr-f), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κύπελος, a swift, + μορφή, form.] In Huxley's system of classification (1867), a group of megithognathous birds, the same as Cypseli, Cypseloides, or Cypseliformes, considered as connecting the Cornucomorphae and the Coccygomorphae. The technical characters are: a broad, deeply carinate sternum, entire or singly or doubly notched behind, without a furcate manubrium; a rudimentary hypo-didium or none; no expanded scapular and of the clavicle; and not more than one pair of intrinsic springal muscles. cypselomorph (sip'se-lō-môr-f), a. [As Cypselomorpha + -ic.] Same as cypseliform. Cypselus (sip'se-lus), n. [NL., < L. cypselus, < Gr. κύπελος, the swift.] The typical genus of swifts, of the family Cypselidae and subfamily Common European Swift (Cypselus apus).

Cypselinae, having the hind toe versatile and the tarsi feathered. There are numerous species, chiefly of the old world. C. apus is the common swift of Europe.

Cyrena (si-rē-nā), n. [NL., < L. Cyrene, Gr. Κυρήνη, a name of several nymphs.] The typical genus of mollusks of the family Cyrenidae. Lamarck, 1800.

Cyrenaic (si-rē-nā-ik), a. and n. [NL., < L. Cyrenaeus, < Gr. Κυρηναίος, < Κυρήνη, L. Cyrene.] 1. a. 1. Pertaining to Cyrene, an ancient Greek city, capital of Cyrenaica, on the north coast of Africa. — 2. Pertaining or belonging to the (Greek school of hedonistic philosophy established by Aristippus of Cyrene, a disciple of Socrates. According to Aristippus, pleasure is the only rational aim, and the relative values of different pleasures are to be determined by their relative intensities and durations. He maintained also that cognition is limited to sensation.

There is not that sect of Philosophers among the heathen so dissolute, no, not Epicurus, nor Aristippus with all his Cyrenaic rant, but would shut his school doors against such greasy sophisms.

Milton, Church-Government, II, Concl

Also Cyrenium. II. n. One of the Cyrenaic school of philosophers. See I., 2.

Cyrenalism (si-rē-nā-i-sim), n. [NL., < Cyrenae + -ism.] The doctrines of the Cyrenaic philosophers. See Cyrenaic, a., 2.

Cyrenian (si-rē-nā-n), a. and n. [NL., < Cyrena + -ian; < L. Cyrenaeus, Cyrenaicus, etc.: see Cyrenaic.] 1. a. Same as Cyrenaic.

II. n. A native or an inhabitant of Cyrene. See Cyrenaic.

They laid hold upon one Simon, a Cyrenian, coming out of the country, and on him they laid the cross.

Luke xlii. 26.

cyrenid (si-ren'id), n. A bivalve mollusk of the family Cyrenidae.

Cyrenidae (si-ren-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyrena + -idae.] A family of siphonate lamellibranchiate mollusks, typified by the genus Cyrena. They have a sub-circular shell, an external ligament, and several hinge-teeth. The animal has separate short siphons, a large compressed foot, and triangular palpi; the shell has 2 or 3 cardinal teeth and anterior as well as posterior ones, and an external unpraised ligament. The species are inhabitants of fresh or brackish waters. By many conchologists the species are associated in one family with the Cycladidae or Apharidae. Also Corbiculidae.

Right Valve of Cyrena cyrenoides.

In fresh waters the world over occurs a group of usually small bivalve shells, covered with an amber or brown epidermis, while in the brackish waters of warmer countries occur some larger forms. The family under which these are assembled is variously known as Cycladidae or Cyrenidae, the latter name being preferable.

Stand. Nat. Hist., I, 275.

Cyrtillaceae (sir-i-lā-sē-s), n. pl. [NL., < Cyrtilla, the typical genus (prob. < Cyrtillus, Cyril), + -aceae.] A natural order of small evergreen dicotyledonous trees or shrubs, of uncertain relationship, but now placed among the polypetalous orders, near the Thymaleae. There are about 6 known species, constituting 4 genera, all natives of North or tropical America. Cyrtilla, Chitonella, and Althoffia, each of a single species, are found in the southern United States, with fragrant white flowers in racemes, and heavy and compact wood, whence the common name of ironwood.

Cyrtillae (si-ril'ik), a. [LL. Cyrtillus, < Gr. Κύρτιλος, a proper name, Cyril.] Of or pertaining to St. Cyril; specifically, noting an alphabet adopted by the Slavic peoples belonging to the Eastern Church, invented by Cyril and Methodius, the apostles of the Slavs, in the ninth century. It is believed to have superseded the Glagolitic as being easier both for the copyist to write and for the foreigner to acquire. Some of its signs are modified from the Glagolitic, but those which Greek and Slavic have in common are taken from the Greek. It was brought into general use by St. Cyril's pupil, Clement, first bishop of Bulgaria. The Russian alphabet is a slight modification of it.

cyrtologist (sir-i-lō-j'ik), a. [Also formerly curtologia; < Gr. κυρτολογία, speaking literally (applied to hieroglyphics which consist of simple pictures, not symbols, of the things meant), < κύρτος, authorized, legitimate, proper, vernacular, lit. having power (see church), + -λογία, < λογος, speak.] 1. Relating to hieroglyphics of a certain sort (see etymology). — 2. Relating or pertaining to capital letters.

Cyrtellaria (sēr-tē-lā-ri-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κύρτος, curved, arched, + dim. -ella + -aria.] A family or an order of nassellarian radiolarians, having a complete lattice-shell enveloping the central capsule. It is divided into the sub-orders Spyroidea, Botryodea, and Cyrtodea.

Cyrtida (sēr-ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κύρτος, curved, arched, + -ida.] A family of monopylarian radiolarians, having a siliceous skeleton in the form of a monaxonie or triradiate test. See Eucyrtididae. Haeckel.

Cyrtoceran (sēr-tōs-er-ān), a. [Irreg. < Cyrtoceras + -an.] Same as cyrtoceratite.

Cyrtoceras (sēr-tōs-er-ās), n. [NL., < Gr. κύρτος, curved, arched, + κέρας, horn.] A genus of fossil cephalopods having the shell bent or bowed. Also Cyrtocera, Cyrtocera, Cyrtoceras, Cyrtoceras, and Cyrtoceratites.

cyrtoceratid (sēr-tō-sēr-ā-tid), n. A cephalopod of the family Cyrtoceratidae.

Cyrtoceratidae (sēr-tō-sēr-ā-ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cyrtoceras (-erat-) + -idae.] A family of nautiloid cephalopods, typified by the genus Cyrtoceras. The shell is arched, the siphon small and subcentral or submarginal, and the aperture simple. Numerous species inhabited the Paleozoic seas. Generally associated with the Nautilidae.

cyrtoceratite (sēr-tō-sēr-ā-tit), n. [NL., < Cyrtoceras (-erat-) + -ite.] A fossil cephalopod of the genus Cyrtoceras.

cyrtoceratite (sēr-tō-sēr-ā-tit'ik), a. [NL., < Cyrtoceras + -ic.] Having the character of a cyrtoceratite; bent or bowed, as certain fossil cephalopods: opposed to orthoceratite. Also cyrtoceran.

cyrtolite (sēr-tō-lit), n. [NL., < Gr. κύρτος, curved, + λίθος, stone.] A mineral related to silex in form and composition, but hydrous, and perhaps resulting from its alteration. The faces of the crystals are commonly convex, whence the name.

cyrtometer (sēr-tōm'e-tēr), n. [NL., < Gr. κύρτος, curved, bent, + μετρον, a measure.] An instrument for ascertaining the size and shape of the chest.

The cyrtometer is used for delineating the external contour of the chest and for exact comparison of one side with the other.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XIV, 128.

Cyrtomys (sēr-tō-niks), n. [NL. (J. Gould, 1845), < Gr. κύρτος, curved, arched, + μύς, nail.]

Mammal Quail or Partridge (Cyrtomys mazama).

A genus of American partridges or quails, the harlequin quails, of the family Tetraonidae and subfamily Montophrinae or Ortyinae: so called from the large curved claws. The bill is very stout, the head crested, the tail so short that the rectrices are almost hidden by the coverts, and the wing-coverts and inner secondaries elongated, covering the primaries when the wing is closed. The type is the Massena quail or partridge of the southwestern United States and Mexico (C. massena), a handsome species, the male of which has the face curiously striped with black and white, the under parts being velvety black and mahogany brown crowded with circular white spots.

Oxytomyx (sēr-tō-fl'um), n. [NL., < Gr. oxytōx, curved, arched, + phallom, leaf.] A genus of orthopterous insects, of the family Leucostictidae, of large size, green color. broad foliaceous wings, and arboreal habits; the katydids. There are a dozen species in the United States. C. concavus is the common katydid. Also Oxytomyx Burmeister, 1858. See cat under katydid.

cyst (sist), n. [Gr. cystis, < Gr. κύστις, the bladder, a bag, pouch, < κύω, conceive, be pregnant, orig. hold, contain. (f. cyma.)] 1. In anat., a bladder; a large vesicle.—2. In pathol., a bladder-like bag or vesicle in animal bodies which includes morbid matter.

The larval form of tape worm which is commonly developed in cysts of the liver of the mouse and the rat (Owen, Anat., v.

3. In zool., a hydatid; a cystic worm, or encysted state of a tapeworm.—4. In cryptogamiae bot., a cell or cavity, usually including other cells or reproductive bodies, as an envelop inclosing a group of diatoms or desmids, or a cell containing an anthozoid; in certain algae, a spore-case. See conocyst.

Sometimes, improperly, cist.
Dermoid cyst. See dermoid. Ovarian cyst. See ovarian.

cystadenoma (sis'ta-de-nō'mā), n.; pl. cystadenomata (-mā-tā) [NL., < cystis, cyst, + adenoma, an adenoma in which cysts are formed.

cystalgia (sis'tal'jā), n. [NL., < Gr. κύστις, bladder, + ἄλγος, pain.] In pathol., pain in the urinary bladder: especially applied to pain coming in paroxysms.

cystatrophia (sis'ta-trō'fā), n. [NL., < Gr. κύστις, bladder, + ἀτροφία, atrophy.] In pathol., atrophy of the bladder. Dunlopian.

cystectomy (sis'tek'tā-si), n. [Gr. κύστις, bladder, + ἐκτομή, extension, < ἐκτείνω, extend: see extend.] 1. Dilatation of the bladder.—2. In surg., a form of lithotomy in which a dilator is introduced through an incision in the membranous portion of the urethra, and forcibly dilates the prostatic portion to an extent sufficient to allow of the extraction of the stone. Also called lithotomy.

cysted (sis'ted), a. [Gr. cyst + -ed.] Inclosed in a cyst; encysted.

cystelminth (sis'tel-minth), n. [Gr. κύστις, a bladder (see cyst), + εἰμύρις (εἰμύρις), a worm.] A cystic worm.

cystenchyma, cystenchyme (sis'teng'ki-mā, -kim), n. [NL., cystenchyma, < Gr. κύστις, a bladder (see cyst), + χῆμα, an infusion.] A kind of connective tissue occurring in some sponges, in some respects resembling certain kinds of vegetable parenchyma, consisting of closely adjacent oval cells of large size with thin walls and fluid contents.

Cystenchyma very commonly forms a layer just below the skin of some (leodidæ, . . . and on the trunk of the . . . a large number of refringent fluid globules immiscible with water are set free, it is just possible it is sometimes a fatty tissue. Sollas, Encyc. Brit., XXII 419.

cystenchymatous (sis'teng-kim'a-tus), a. [Gr. cystenchyma (see cystenchyma) + -ous.] Having the character or quality of cystenchyma; containing or consisting of cystenchyma.

cystenchyma, n. See cystenchyma.

Cystoides (sis'tō-id'ō), n. pl. [NL.] Same as Cystoidea.

cystic (sis'tik), a. [= F. cystique = Sp. cístico = Pg. cístico = It. cistico, < NL. cysticus, < cystis, a cyst: see cyst.] 1. In anat., pertaining to a cyst, in any sense. Specifically (a) Pertaining to the hepatic cyst or gall bladder, as the cystic duct (conveying gall into the gall bladder), the cystic artery (a branch of the hepatic artery going to the gall bladder), the cystic plexus of nerves, a cystic concretion, a cystic remora. (b) Pertaining to the urinary bladder.

2. Resembling a cyst; cystoid; vesicular; bladderly.—3. Having a cyst or cysts: full of cysts; cystose: as, a cystic tumor.—4. In zool., encysted; cysticercoid; hydatid: specifically applied to the encysted or hydatid state of any tapeworm (Tenia): opposed to cercoid (which see).

Also, improperly, custo.

Cystic worm, or bladder-worm, a hydatid or scolex of a tapeworm, which may be a cysticercus with one tentacle, or a scolex or scolopocercus with several such heads. See these words, and cut under tenia.

cystic (sis'tik), a. [Gr. cystis (see cyst) + -ic.] Pertaining to or derived from cystin. Cystic acid, C<sub>12</sub>H<sub>10</sub>O<sub>8</sub>, a substance occurring in rare cases in urinary calculi which have a crystalline structure and are insoluble in water, alcohol, and ether: same as cystin.

Cysticæ (sis'ti-kæ), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of cysticus: see cystic.] An old name of cystic worms, hydatids, or cysticerci, collectively, given when these were supposed to be a natural group of mature organisms. Rudolphi.

cysticercoid (sis-ti-sēr'koid), a. and n. [Gr. cysticercus + -oid.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to a cysticercus or other larva of a tapeworm; hydatid.

II. n. The hydatid or encysted state of the larva of any tapeworm.

The dog devours the house and the cysticercoid becomes a Tenia cucumina in his intestine. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 187.

cysticercus (sis-ti-sēr'kus), n. [NL., < Gr. κύστις, bladder (see cyst), + κύρως, tail.] A cystic worm or bladder-worm; a hydatid; an encysted scolex or tenia-head; the encysted state of the larva of a tapeworm. The name was originally given as a generic term under the impression that the so called Cysticercus cellulosus was a distinct genus and species of a parasite. It is the larva of the Tenia solium, found in men's pork, and developing in man into the tapeworm. It has but one tentacle head in the cyst, and the term cysticercus is retained as a convenient designation of such larvae. Thus, the cysticercus of the ox becomes in man Tenia mediocanellata, the Cysticercus puriformis of the rabbit becomes Tenia serialis of the dog, wolf, or fox; the Cysticercus fascicularis of the rat and mouse develops in the cat as Tenia cranialis. The cystic worm of Tenia canis of the dog has many heads, and is known as a cercus, and the Cercaria o. robusta is found in the brain of sheep. Another form of many headed cystic worm, complicated by proliferation is the larva of Tenia echinococcus of the dog, known as an echinococcus. Echinococcus pericranium being found in the liver of man as well as of various domestic animals. See tenia, cercus, echinococcus, and nolet.

cysticle (sis'ti-kl), n. [Gr. κύστις, bladder, dim. of cystis, a cyst: see cyst.] A small cyst.

In some. At least plus the cysticles are not complicated with pigment cells. Owen, Anat., v.

cystid (sis'tid), n. [Gr. κύστις, a bladder (see cyst), < κύω, see cyst.] In Polyzoon: (a) The sac-like, planuliform, ciliated embryo, from one end of which one or more polypids are developed from thickenings of the wall of the sac.

The cystid is comparable to a vesicular morula. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 396.

(b) The cell in which the body of the mature individual is contained, as distinguished from the polypid itself.

The body and tentacular apparatus has been incorrectly regarded as a kind of individual, and opposed to the cell or cystid in which it is placed, as the polypid (Claus, Zoology (trans.), II 73).

cystide (sis'tid or -tid), n. [Gr. cystidium.] 1. Same as cystidium.—2. In fungi of the family redinæ, name as paraphyma.

Cystidea, Cystideum (sis-tid'ē-ā, -ō), n. pl. [NL.] An order of fossil crinoids: synonymous with Cystoidea (which see).

cystidean (sis-tid'ē-an), n. [Gr. κύστις + -an.] A cystic crinoid; an crinoid of the order Cystidea.

cystides, n. Plural of cystis.

cystidia, n. Plural of cystidium.

cystidicolous (sis-ti-dik'ō-lus), a. [Irreg. < Gr. κύστις (see cyst), a bladder (see cyst), + λόγος, inhabit.] Inhabiting a cyst, as a cystic worm.

cystidium (sis-tid'i-um), n.; pl. cystidia (-jā) [NL., < Gr. κύστις, bladder, + dim. -idium.] In hymenomycetous fungi, a large spherical or ovoid cell which originates among the basidia and paraphyses, and projects beyond them. It is considered to be a sterile basidium. Also cystide.

cystidoparalysis (sis'ti-dō-pā-rā'l'i-sis), n. [NL.] See cystoparalysis.

cystidoplegia (sis'ti-dō-plē'jā), n. [NL.] See cystoplegia.

cystifelleotomy (sis-ti-fel'ē-ō-tō'mi), n. [Gr. κύστις, bladder, + fellē (see Gr. χολή), gall, + Gr. τομή, a cutting: see anatomy.] Same as cholecystotomy.

cystiferous (sis-tif'ē-rus), a. [Gr. κύστις, bladder (see cyst), + φέρω = E. bear.] Having or producing cysts; cystogenous.

cystiform (sis'ti-form), a. [Gr. κύστις, bladder (see cyst), + forma, shape.] 1. Having the form or character of a cyst; cystic in form.—2. Encysted; hydatid; cysticercoid: as, a cystiform worm.

cystognathid (sis-tig'nā-thid), n. A toad-like amphibian of the family Cystognathidae.
Cystognathidae (sis-tig'nā-thid), n. pl. [NL., < Cystognathus + -idae.] A family of anurous salient amphibians, typified by the genus Cystognathus, with toothed upper jaw and subocular or little dilated sacral diapophyses. It is one of the largest families of the order, with 26 genera and 180 species, representing great diversity in mode of life, some being terrestrial or arboreal and others aquatic. It is represented only in the Australian and Neotropical regions.

Cystognathus (sis-tig'nā-thus), n. [NL., < Gr. κύστις, bladder (see cyst), + νόθος, jaw.] The typical genus of toads of the family (Cystognathidae). C. nectatus is an example. Also Cystognathus, Wagler, 1830.

cystin (sis'tin), n. [Gr. κύστις, bladder, + -in.] A substance (C<sub>12</sub>H<sub>10</sub>NO<sub>8</sub>) crystallizing in colorless six-sided plates, and constituting a rare kind of urinary calculus.

Cystiphyllidæ (sis-ti-flī'dē), n. pl. [NL., < Cystiphyllum + -idæ.] A family of Paleozoic rugose stone-corals, of the order Sclerodermata and group Rugosæ. The corallum is simple, rarely compound, the septa are very rudimentary, and the visceral chamber is filled with little vesicles formed by combined tabulae and dissepiments. Edwards and Hays, 1890.

Cystiphyllum (sis-ti-flī'um), n. [NL., < Gr. κύστις, bladder, + φυλλον, leaf.] The typical genus of fossil stone-corals of the family (Cystiphyllidæ). Marchison, 1830. Also (Cystiphyllum), Dana, 1846.

cystirrhagia (sis-ti-rā'jā), n. [NL., < Gr. κύστις, bladder, + ῥαγία, < ῥήγναι, break.] In pathol.: (a) Hemorrhage from the bladder. (b) Cystirrhæa.

cystirrhæa, cystirrhœa (sis-ti-rō'jā), n. [NL., cystirrhœa, < Gr. κύστις, the bladder, + ῥοή, a flowing, < ῥέω, flow.] In pathol., a discharge of mucus from the bladder; venial catarrh. Also cystorrhœa, cystorrhœa.

cystis (sis'tis), n.; pl. cystides (-ti-dēs). [NL.: see cyst.] Same as cyst.

Cystiscidae (sis-tis'idē), n. pl. [NL., < Cystiscus + -idae.] A family of pectinibranchiate gastropods, typified by the genus Cystiscus. The shell is undistinguishable from that of a marginellid, but the teeth of the radula are peculiar, being in one row, transverse, multiseptal, and with three or more longer than the others. The species are of small size and inhabitants of various seas.

Cystiscus (sis-tis'kus), n. [NL. (Stimpson, 1855), dim. of Gr. κύστις, bladder: see cyst.] The typical genus of Cystiscidae.

cystitis (sis'ti'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. κύστις, the bladder, + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the bladder.

cystitome (sis'ti-tōm), n. [Gr. κύστις, cyst (with reference to the cystis or capsule of the crystalline lens), + τομή, cutting. Cf. cystotome.] In surg., an instrument for opening the capsule of the crystalline lens.

cystobubonocèle (sis'tō-bū-bō'nō-sēl), n. [Gr. κύστις, bladder, + βουβών, the groin, + κῆλη, tumor.] In surg., a rare kind of hernia, in which the urinary bladder protrudes through the inguinal opening.

cystocarp (sis'tō-kārp), n. [Gr. κύστις, bladder, + καρπός, fruit.] The sexual fruit of algae of the order Floridæ, consisting of spores either without a special membranous envelop or contained within a conceptacle or pericarp. Also cystocarpus, sporocarp.

cystocarpic (sis'tō-kār'pik), a. [Gr. cystocarp + -ic.] Consisting of cystocarps; having the character of a cystocarp.

In Nemalion the cystocarpic fruit is a globular mass of spores. Perlov, Marine Algae, p. 20.

Cystocarpic spore, a σποροσπείρα.
cystocèle (sis'tō-sēl), n. [Gr. κύστις, bladder, + κῆλη, tumor.] A hernia or rupture formed by the protrusion of the urinary bladder.

cystococcoid (sis'tō-kōk'oid), a. [Gr. κύστις + -oid.] Resembling algae of the genus Cystococcus.

Cystococcus (sis-tō-kōk'us), n. [NL., < Gr. cystis, bladder, + coccus, berry.] A genus of the lowest chlorophyll-green fresh-water algae, consisting of spherical cells, single or united in small families. They are common on damp earth, bark of trees, etc., and are thought to constitute the gonidia of some lichens.

cystocyte (sis-tō-sit), n. [cystis, a bladder (see cyst), + cyte, a hollow, a cavity (cell).] In sponges, one of the large cyst-like cells of cystenchyma, filled with fluid, and containing a nucleus with its included nucleolus supported in the fluid contents by fine protoplasmic threads which extend to the inner surface of the cell-wall and there spread out in a film.

cystodynia (sis-tō-din'i-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. cystis, bladder, + dýnē, pain.] In pathol., pain in the bladder.

cystofibroma (sis-tō-fī-brō'mā), n.; pl. cystofibromata (-mā-tā). [NL., < cystis + fibroma.] A fibroma containing cysts.

cystogenesis (sis-tō-jen'e-sis), n. [cystis, bladder (see cyst), + genesis, origin.] Same as cystogenesis.

cystogenous (sis-toj'e-nus), a. [cystis, bladder (see cyst), + gēnēs, producing; see -genous.] Producing or bearing cells; cystiferous.

cystoid (sin'toid), a. [cyst + -oid.] 1. Presenting the appearance of a cyst; cystiform.—2. Pertaining to the Cystoidea; cystoidean.

Cystoidea (sis-toi'dē-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. cystis, bladder, + eidōs, form.] An order of fossil crinoids, encrinurids or stone-lilies, having a rounded body inclosed in many pentagonal sutured plates, a jointed stalk, and a lateral orifice closed by a pyramid of jointed plates. The order is correlated with Blastoidea and Crinoida. See Crinoida, 2. Also Cystoidea, Cystoidea, Cystoidea.

cystoidean (sis-toi'dē-an), a. and n. 1. a. Having the character of a cystoid crinoid; specifically, of or pertaining to the Cystoidea.
II. n. A member of the Cystoidea.

cystolith (sis-tō-lith), n. [cystis, bladder, + lithos, stone.] A Section of Leaf of Fucus elastica, highly magnified.

A peculiar concretion formed within the cells of certain plants, composed chiefly of crystals and attached to the wall of the cell by a short pedicel. It occurs frequently in the Oenotheraceae and Adiantaceae, in the cells of the epidermis or subadjacent tissue, but is rarely found in other orders.

In the epidermal cells of species of Fucus, prolongations inward of the cell wall occur, at the extremity of which small crystals of carbonate of lime are deposited, to these the name cystolith has been applied. Encyc. Brit., IV, 40.

cystolithiasis (sis-tō-lith'i-ā-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. cystis, bladder, + lithos, stone, + -iasis.] In pathol., the presence of a stone in the urinary bladder.

cystolithic (sin-tō-lith'ik), a. [cystis, a bladder, + lithos, a stone (see cystolith and cystolithiasis), + -ic.] In med., relating to stone in the bladder.

cystoma (sis-tō-mā), n.; pl. cystomata (-mā-tā). [NL., < cystis, a cyst, + -oma.] A tumor containing cysts.

cystomorphous (sis-tō-mōr'fus), a. [cystis, bladder (see cyst), + morphē, form, + -ous.] Cyst-like; cystiform; cystoid.

cystoparalysis (sis-tō-pā-rā-l'i-sis), n. [NL., also less prop. cystoparalysis; < Gr. cystis, bladder, + paralysis, not 'paralysis', bladder, + paralysis, paralysis.] In pathol., paralysis of the bladder.

Cystophora (sis-tōf'ō-rā), n. [NL., < Gr. cystis, bladder, + phorā, < phōs = E. bear<sup>1</sup>.] The typical genus of the subfamily Cystophorinae, containing only the hooded or bladder-nosed seal of the northern seas, (Cystophora cristata).

Cystophorinae (sis-tōf'ō-rā-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Cystophora + -inae.] A subfamily of Phocidae, or ordinary earless seals, containing the bottle-nosed, bladder-nosed, and elephant seals. They have an inflatable proboscis-like cyst on the snout, accompanied by modifications of the nasal and intermaxillary bones, and 4 incisors in each half of the upper and 2 in each half of the lower jaw. The group consists of the genera Cystophora and Monorhinus, containing respectively the arctic bladder-nosed and the antarctic bottle-nosed seals. See also cut under seal.

Hood of Hooded Seal (Cystophora cristata), showing relation of the inflatable proboscis to the skull. (From "Science.") cystoplast (sis-tō-plast), n. A nucleated cell having an envelop.

cystoplastic (sis-tō-plas'tik), a. [cystoplasty + -ic.] Pertaining to or of the nature of cystoplasty.

cystoplasty (sis-tō-plas-ti), n. [cystis, bladder, + plasty, verbal adj. of plassein, form.] A surgical operation for repair of the bladder, as the operation for vesico-vaginal fistula.

cystoplegia (sis-tō-plē'jā), n. [NL., also imp. prop. cystoplegia; < Gr. cystis, bladder, + plēgē, a blow, stroke, < plassein, strike. Cf. cystoparalysis.] In pathol., paralysis of the bladder.

cystoplegic (sis-tō-plē'jik), a. [cystoplegia + -ic.] Pertaining to or resembling cystoplegia.

cystoplex (sis-tō-plēk'si-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. cystis, bladder, + plēgē, a blow, stroke, < plassein, strike.] Same as cystoplegia.

Cystopteris (sis-tōp'tē-ris), n. [NL. (so called from its bladder-like indusium), < Gr. cystis, bladder, + ptēris, a fern.] A genus of delicate frondiferous ferns having the sori borne on the back of the leaf on the middle of a vein and covered with a membranaceous indusium attached only by the base; the bladder-ferns. They are found in cool, damp localities. There are 5 species, of which C. fragilis (the brittle fern) is found from within the arctic circle to Chili, South Africa, and Tasmania. See also cut under bladder-fern.

cystoptosis (sis-tōp'tō-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. cystis, bladder, + ptōsis, a falling, < πτειν, fall.] In pathol., prolapse of the mucous membrane of the bladder into the urethra.

Cystopus (sis-tōp'us), n. [NL., < Gr. cystis, bladder, + opus (work), face, appearance.] A genus of parasitic fungi, belonging to the family Peronosporaceae, and characterized by conidia produced in chains on very short conidiophores, forming compact sori upon the supporting leaf. C. candidus is injurious to the cabbage, radish, and other cruciferous plants.

cystorrhoea, cystorrhoea (sis-tō-rō-ē-ā), n. [NL.] Same as cystorrhoea.

cystose (sis-tō-sē), a. [cyst + -ose.] Containing cysts; full of cysts; cystic; bladdery; vesicular.

cystospastic (sis-tō-spas'tik), a. [cystis, bladder, + spastic, < σπαστικός, verbal adj. of σπᾶν, draw back, < σπᾶν, spasm; see spasm.] In pathol., pertaining to spasm of the bladder.

cystotania (sis-tō-tā-ni-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. cystis, bladder, + tania, a tapeworm; see tania.] 1. A tapeworm: so called from the formation of the cysts characteristic of its larval state.—2. [cap.] Same as Tania.

cystotome (sis-tō-tōm), n. [= F. cystotome = Pg. cystotoma, < Gr. cystis, bladder, + tomē, cutting, < τέμνω, cut. Cf. cystotomus.] A surgical instrument for cutting the bladder. Sometimes improperly called a lithotome.

cystotomy (sis-tō-tō-mi), n. [= F. cystotomie = Sp. cystotomia = Pg. cystotomia = It. cystotomia, < NL. cystotomia, < Gr. cystis, bladder, + tomē, cutting, < τέμνω, cut. Cf. cystotome.] In surg., the operation of opening encysted tumors for the discharge of morbid matter; specifically, the operation of cutting into the urinary bladder for the extraction of a stone or for any other purpose.

cystus (sis'tus), a. [cyst + -ous.] Cystic. Dunlopian.

cystula (sis'tū-lā), n.; pl. cystulae (-lā). [NL., dim. of cystis, a cyst; see cyst.] In bot., a round closed apothecium in lichens. The term is also applied to the little open cups on the upper surface of the fronds in plants of the genus Marchantia.

cyste (sit), n. [cystis, a hollow, a cavity, as the hold of a vessel, < κυσ, conceive, orig. contain, cf. cyst, cyma.] In bot., a cell; a cytode; especially, a nucleated cell, of whatever character, regarded as the fundamental form-element of all tissues. The word alone is rare, but common in composition, as leucocyte, and regularly in the histology of sponges, as choanocyte, collenocyte, dermoocyte, myocyte, etc.

cystinet, n. An obsolete spelling of cithara.

Cythra (si-thē'rā), n. [NL., < L. (Cythra, Cythra, < Gr. Kythra, Aphrodite (Venus); see Cythraean.] The typical genus of marine ostracodes of the family Cythereidae. Müller, 1785.

Cytherea (sith-e-rē-ā), n. [NL., after L. (Cytherea, a name of Venus; see Cytherean.] A genus of siphonate bivalve mollusks, of the family Veneridae, founded by Lamarck in 1806. It is distinguished from Venus by an anterior left lateral tooth. There are numerous species, mostly of the warmer seas.

Cytherea dani.

Cytherean (sith-e-rē-an), a. [Cytherea, pertaining to Cytherea, Venus, < Gr. Kythra, Aphrodite; so named from Kythra, L. Cytherea, now Cerigo, an island south of Greece, near the coast of which Aphrodite was fabled to have risen from the sea, and where she was specially worshiped.] 1. In myth., pertaining to the goddess Aphrodite (Venus).—2. In astron., pertaining to the planet Venus.

Not only is the apparent movement of Venus across the sun extremely slow, . . . but three distinct atmospheres—the solar, terrestrial, and Cytherean—combine to deform outlines and mask the geometrical relations which it is desired to connect with a strict count of time.

A. M. Clarke, Astron. in 19th Cent., p. 284.

Cythereidae, Cytheridae (sith-e-rē-i-dē, sith-er-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < (Cythere + -idae).] A family of marine ostracod entomostracous crustaceans, typified by the genus Cythere.

A species of Cythere. a, antennae; b, antenna; c, mandible; d, first maxilla; e, e, second maxilla and two thoracic members; f, caudal end; g, eye.

lobate forks. There are several genera besides Cythere.

Cytheromania (sith-e-rō-mā-ni-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. Kythra, Aphrodite (see Cytherean), + mania, madness.] Nymphomania. Dunlopian.

Cythinaceae (sit'i-nā-sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Cytinus + -aceae.] A small natural order of apetalous, parasitic, fleshy, leafless or scaly plants, allied to the Aristolochiaceae and to Nepenthes. It includes the East Indian genus Rafflesia, remarkable for its gigantic flowers.

Cytinus (sit'i-nus), n. [NL. (from the form and color of the plant), < Gr. κίτινος, the calyx of the pomegranate, < κίτος, a hollow.] A small genus of parasitic plants, the type of the Cythinaceae. C. hypocistis, of the Mediterranean region, is of a rich yellow or orange red color, and has been used as an astringent. The other species belong to South Africa and Mexico.

Cytoplast (sit'i-ō-plāst), n. [cystis, assumed dim. of cystis, a hollow (cell), + plastis, a germ.] The protoplasmic nucleus of a cell: used with reference to certain fresh-water algae. Also cytoblast.

Cytinus hypocistis.

A central cytoblast wrapped up in generally radiating protoplasm. H. C. Wood, Fresh Water Algae, p. 154.

Cytoplast (sit'i-ō-plāst), n. [cystis, assumed dim. of cystis, a hollow (cell), + plastis, a germ.] The protoplasmic nucleus of a cell: used chiefly with reference to diatoms and desmids.

Cytoplast (sit'i-ō-plāst), n. [cystis, assumed dim. of cystis, a hollow (a cell), + plastis, anything formed or molded.] In bot., same as protoplast: used chiefly with reference to diatoms and desmids. Also cytoplasm.

Cytoplast (sit'i-ō-plāst), n. [cystis, assumed dim. of cystis, a hollow (a cell), + plastis, anything formed or molded.] In bot., same as protoplast: used chiefly with reference to diatoms and desmids. Also cytoplasm.

Cytoplast (sit'i-ō-plāst), n. [cystis, assumed dim. of cystis, a hollow (a cell), + plastis, anything formed or molded.] In bot., same as protoplast: used chiefly with reference to diatoms and desmids. Also cytoplasm.

plants. It is of a nauseous taste, emetic, and poisonous.

Cytisus (sit'i-sus), n. [NL., < L. cytiscus, a shrubby kind of clover, prob. Medicago arborea (Linnaeus).] A genus of hardy leguminous papilionaceous shrubs, natives almost exclusively of the countries bordering on the Mediterranean. The leaves are usually composed of three leaflets, but some species are leafless. The large flowers are yellow, purple, or white. (One species, C. scoparius (brown), is an extremely common shrub on uncultivated grounds, heaths, etc., of most parts of Great Britain. Some exotic species are common garden- and shrubby-plants, as C. purpureus, an elegant procumbent shrub used in rock-work, C. alpinus, etc. See Broom.)

Broom (Cytisus scoparius) a, flowering branch; b, flower, natural size.
(From Le Maout and DeCandolle's "Traité général de Botanique.")

cytisis (si-ti'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. κίτος, skin (see cutis), + -itis.] Same as dermatitis.

cytoblast (si'tō-blást), n. [cyto, < Gr. κίτος, a hollow (a cell), + blastos, a sprout, germ.] 1. Same as cytoblast.—2. One of the amebiform cells or cell-elements of the cytoblastema of sponges; a cytode of a sponge.

cytoblastema (si'tō-blást-tē'mā), n. [NL., < Gr. κίτος, a hollow (a cell), + πλασμα, a sprout, germ.] 1. The protoplasm or viscid fluid in which animal and vegetable cells are produced. Hence—2. The blastema or germinal or formative material of a cytode; protoplasmic cell-substance: specifically used of the common gelatinous matrix of protozoans, as sponges.

cytoblastematous, cytoblastemic (si'tō-blást-tē'mā-tis, -ik), a. Same as cytoblastematous.

cytoblastomous (si'tō-blást-tē'mā-us), a. [cytoblastema + -ous.] Of or pertaining to cytoblastema.

cytocoocus (si'tō-kōk'us), n. [NL., < Gr. κίτος, a hollow (a cell), + κόκος, a berry.] The kernel of a parent cell; the nucleus of a cytula. A cytocoocus differs from the nucleus of an ordinary cell in that it is supposed to include in itself some of the substance of the spermatocyst by which the female ovum is fecundated and made to become a cytula. Also cytuloocus. Haecckel.

cytode (si'tōd), n. [cyto, as if **κυτός*, contr. of **κυτός*, like a hollow, < κίτος, a hollow (a cell), + εδος, form, shape.] In bot.: (a) A term applied by Haecckel to a unicellular organism or element which has the value of a simple cell, but possesses no distinct nucleus.

It is, nevertheless, a deeply significant fact, that the building stones of the bodies of higher animals are never represented by cytodes, but always by cells.
Frey, Histol. and Histochem (trans.), p. 64.

(b) A cell in general.

I shall, therefore, assume provisionally that the primary form of every animal is a nucleated protoplasmic body, cytode, or cell, in the most general acceptance of the latter term.
Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 263

cytogenesis (si'tō-jen'ē-sis), n. [cyto, < Gr. κίτος, a hollow (a cell), + γενεσις, generation.] Cell-formation; the genesis or development of cells in animal and vegetable organisms: originally used in vegetable physiology. Also cytogenesis, cytogeny.

cytogenetic (si'tō-jē-net'ik), a. [cytogenesis, after genetic.] Generating or developing cells; cytogenous; relating to cytogenesis.

cytogenous (si'tō-jē-nus), a. [cyto, < Gr. κίτος, a hollow (a cell), + γενος, producing: see -genous.] Producing cells; cytogenetic: specifically applied by Kölliker to retiform, reticular, areolar, or ordinary cellular tissue, but properly predicable only of cells themselves, as all other organic structures arise from cells.

cytogeny (si'tō-jē-ni), n. Same as cytogenesis.
cytoid (si'tōid), a. [cyto + -oid.] Cell-like: a term applied by Henle to corpuscles, as of lymph, chyle, etc., which seem to resemble each other essentially in their chemical and microscopical characters. Dungsloen.

Cytophora (si'tō-phō-rā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κίτος, a hollow (a cell), + φόρος, < φέρω = E. bear<sup>1</sup>.] A class of protozoans: same as Radiolaria.
cytoplasm (si'tō-plāzm), n. [cyto, < Gr. κίτος, a hollow (a cell), + πλάσμα, anything formed. Cf. cytoplasm.] Same as protoplasm.

It [protoplasm] has also received from Beale, Kölliker, and Dujardin respectively, the names bioplasm, cytoplasm, and sarcod.
Frey, Histol. and Histochem (trans.), p. 68

cytoplasmic (si'tō-plāz'mik), a. [cytoplasm + -ic.] Pertaining to cytoplasm.

Mitaburger refers these phenomena to the necessity of securing for the differentiating reproductive nucleus a definite cytoplasmic medium.
Microsc. Science, XXVI. 601

cytopye (si'tō-pi'jē), n.; pl. cytopyga. [NL., < Gr. κίτος, a hollow (a cell), + πύη, the ramp.] The so-called excretory or anal aperture of unicellular animals. Haecckel.

cytosome (si'tō-stōm), n. [cyto, < Gr. κίτος, a hollow (a cell), + σώμα, mouth.] The mouth of a single-celled animal; the oral aperture or orifice of ingestion of unicellular organisms.

cytostomous (si'tō-stō-mus), a. [cytosome + -ous.] Pertaining to a cytosome.

cytheca (si'tō-thē-kā), n.; pl. cythecae (-sē). [NL., < Gr. κύθος, a hollow (thorax), + θησαυρος, case.] Same as thoracotheca.

Cytosoa (si'tō-sō'jā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. κίτος, a hollow (a cell), + ζώον, animal.] Same as Sporozoa or Gregarinida. See the extract.

With few (if any) exceptions, the falciform young [ar-garines or sporozoa] . . . penetrates a cell of some tissue of its host and there undergoes the first stages of its growth (hence called Cytosoa).
Enrye, Brit., XVI. 532

cyttid (si'tid), n. A fish of the family Cyttidae.

Cyttidae (si'ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < cyttus + -idae.] In Günther's classification of fishes, a family of Acanthopterygii cyttoscombriformes, with no bony stay for the prooperculum, an elevated body, two indistinct divisions of the dorsal fin, and an increased number of vertebrae: synonymous with Zenidae.

Cyttina (si'ti-nā), n. pl. [NL., < cyttus + -ina.] In Günther's classification of fishes, the third group of Scombridae. It is characterized by a distinct division of the dorsal fin into two, the spinous being less developed than the soft part, an elevated body, and very small or rudimentary scales. The group was later raised to the rank of a family, Cyttidae.

cyttoid (si'toid), n. [cyttus + -oid.] A fish of the family Cyttidae.

Cyttus (si'tis), n. [NL. (Günther, 1860), < Gr. κύνος, an unknown fish referred to by Athenaeus in the Deipnosophistae.] A genus of scombroid fishes, giving name to the family Cyttidae.

cytula (si'tū-lā), n.; pl. cytulae (-lā). [NL., dim. of Gr. κίτος, a hollow, a cavity (a cell).] In bot., a fertilized egg-cell; an impregnated ovum; the parent cell of any organism. It is the ovum of the female, which is fecundated by becoming united with the substance of one spermatozoon, or more, of the male.

The parent-cell (cytula), which was formerly regarded as merely the fertilized egg cell, differs very essentially, therefore, both in point of form (morphologically), and in point of composition (chemically), and lastly also in point of vital qualities (physiologically). Its origin is partly paternal, partly maternal, and we need not, therefore, be surprised when we see that the child which develops from this parent-cell inherits individual qualities from both parents.
Haecckel, Evol. of Man (trans.), I. 182

cytulococcus (si'tū-lō-kōk'us), n. [NL., < cytula, q. v., + Gr. κόκος, berry. Cf. cytocoocus.] Same as cytuloocus. Haecckel.

cytuloplasm (si'tū-lō-plāzm), n. [cyto, < Gr. κίτος, a hollow (a cell), + πλάσμα, anything formed, < πλάσσω, form, mold.] The protoplasmic substance of a cytula or fecundated ovule, resulting from the mingling of spermoplasm with ovoplasm.

cyvar (kē'vār), n. [W. cyfar, lit. joint plowing, < cyf, cy, together = L. com-, co-, + arn, plow; cf. ar, plowed land.] A Welsh measure of land, from one half to two thirds of an acre.

cyvelin (kē've-lin), n. [W. cyvelin, a cubit, half a yard, < cyf, cy, together, + elin, elbow: see ell, elbow.] A Welsh measure of cloth, equal to 9 feet.

Cyziacus (si'zi-ā-sū), a. [Cyziacus, < Cyziacus, Cyzicum, < Gr. Κύζικος.] Pertaining to the ancient Greek city of Cyzius in Mysia, Asia Minor.

czar, tsar (sār, tsār), n. [Also written sometimes tsar; prop., according to the Russ. form, tsar, but in E. first and still more usually czar; = D. czar = Dan. Sw. czar = Sp. czar, zar = Pg. czar, tsar = It. czar, after F. czar, also tsar, tsar, through G. tsar, also zar, through OPol. czar, < Russ. tsar, more exactly tsari or tsare (the first letter being ts, the 23d letter of the Russ. alphabet, pron. ts, and the last being ri (mute final i or e), the 29th), = Pol. car (pron. tsar), formerly spelled czar, = Bohem. Serv. Bulg. car (tsar), the name and title of the Emperor of Russia, also applied to the Sultan of Turkey; in fuller form Russ. tsarski, tsarski = Pol. czars = Bohem. czarski = Serv. czar = Croatian czar = Slov. czar = OPol. tsarski, emperor, czar; derived, prob. through the OHG. keisar (MHG. keiser, G. kaiser: see kaiser, czsar), from L. czsar, emperor, orig. the cognomen of Julius Czasar: see czsar, and cf. kaiser, with which czar, tsar is ult. identical.] 1. An emperor; a king; specifically, the common title of the Emperor of Russia. In old Russian annals the Mongol prince of Russia from the twelfth century are called czars; the first independent Russian prince to assume the title was Ivan IV., the Terrible, who in 1547 was crowned Czar of Moscow. The title czar, though historically equivalent, like its original Cesar, to emperor, was not recognized as involving imperial rank at the time of its assumption by Ivan; and Peter the Great's assumption of such rank under the title of emperor, in addition to that of czar, was long contested by other powers.

2. An article of dress, apparently a cravat, in use in the early part of the eighteenth century: probably named in compliment to Peter the Great, who visited England in 1698.

czardas (sār'das; Hung. pron. chār'dosh), n. [Hung.] A Hungarian national dance.

czarevitch, tsarevitch (sār'-, tsār'e-vich), n. [= F. czarévitch, tsarévitch = G. tsarévitch, < Russ. tsarévich (the last two letters being che (ch), the 24th, and er (silent e) the 27th, of the Russ. alphabet), prince, < tsar, emperor: see czar, tsar. Another Russ. form is tsarévich, > G. czarevitch, F. czarévitich, E. czarevitch or czarevitch.] A Russian prince (imperial): formerly applied to any son of the Emperor of Russia, now specifically to the eldest son. Also czarévitch, tsarévitch, czarévitch, czarévitch, and (in another form) czarevitch, czarevitch.

czarevna, tsarevna (sār-, tsār'ev'nā), n. [Russ. tsarevna, princess (imperial), < tsar, emperor: see czar, tsar. Another Russ. form is tsarevna, > G. czarevna, F. czarévena, E. czarevna.] A Russian princess (imperial): formerly applied to any daughter of the czar, now only to the wife of the czarévitch.

czarina, tsarina (sār-, tsār'ev'nā), n. [= F. czarine, tsarine = Sp. czarina, tsarina = Pg. czarina, tsarina = It. czarina = G. czarin, tsarin; < czar, tsar, + fem. term, F. -ine, etc., G. -in. The Russ. term is tsarina: see czar.] An empress of Russia; the wife of the Czar of Russia, or a Russian empress regnant. Also czarina, tsarina, tsarina.

czarist (sār'ish), a. [czar + -ist.] Pertaining to the Czar of Russia.

His czarist majesty despatched an express to General Golts with an account of these particulars.
Tatler, No. 55

czaritsa, tsaritsa (sār-, tsār'it'sā), n. [Also tsaritsa, < Russ. tsaritsa, empress, < tsar, emperor: see czar, tsar.] Same as czarina.

czarowitch, tsarowitch, n. See czarevitch.

Czech (chek; more accurately, chech), n. [Also written Czech, Teck, Techeck (prop., according to the orig., **Check*), < Bohem. (Czech) Chék (the first letter being ch (also written h), pron. ch, and the last k, pron. h) = Russ. Chék = Slov. Chék = Upper Sorbian Chék, Lower Sorbian Teck (> Hung. Csek), a Czech.] 1. A member of the most westerly branch of the great Slavic family of races, the term including the Bohemians, or Czechs proper, the Moravians, and the Slovaks. They number nearly 7,000,000, and live chiefly in Bohemia, Moravia, and northern Hungary.—2. The language of the Czechs, usually called Bohemian. It is closely allied to the Polish. See Bohemian, n., 5. Czechish (chek'ik), a. and n. [**Chék* + -ic.] 1. a. Of or belonging to the Czechs.

To reunite . . . Bohemia, Moravia, and Austrian Silesia into one Czechish realm.
The Nation, XXXVI. 544.

II. n. Same as Czech, 2.

scheme of corresponding characters (compare the preceding letters) is as follows:

The sound which the character has from the beginning been used to represent of the sound of voiced mute (or check, stop, contact sound) corresponding to a as aud or breathed, and to n as nasal (See the terms used and the letters referred to.) It is generally called a "dental," but with only a conventional propriety, since the teeth bear no part in its production. It involves a closure of the tip of the tongue against the roof of the mouth at a point near to, or even touching, the upper front teeth (while an intoned or voiced current of air is driven during the closure into the cavity of the mouth, as in the case of the other sonant mutes). It is, then, rather a tongue-tip sound, or a front lingual. Sounds closely akin to it are made with different parts of the front tongue against different parts of the forward palate, hence the d is somewhat variously colored in various languages, and in some there are two diverse d's, or even more than two. The d, as belonging to the fundamental or Germanic part of our language, has taken the place of a more original aspirate, namely, Sanskrit dh, Greek θ, Latin oftenest f, thus, English door = Sanskrit dāura = Greek thura = Latin foras. Its regular correspondent in German is t, thus, for (usually written thor) = English door = but, under special conditions, also a d, thus, German cude = English cad; German gold = English gold. The German d regularly corresponds to English th. (See th.) Our d has no variety of values; it is, however, not seldom made surd, or pronounced as t, as in packed, typed, knewd, and the like, being in older words of this kind a substitute, for mechanical uniformity of spelling, for earlier t, misal being formerly mist, misle, Anglo-Saxon misle, knead, formerly kud, kudr, Anglo-Saxon cude, etc. See ad = ad, ad = ad.

2. As a numeral, in the Roman system, D stands for 500; when a dash or stroke is placed over it, as D, it stands for 5,000.—3. As a symbol: (a) In music: (1) The second tone, or re, of the scale of C. The ratio between the vibration-numbers of these two tones, when in the relation of do and re, is 2. The tone above bass C is represented by D, the octave above by d, etc. See C, 3. (2) A note which represents this tone. On the treble staff D stands on the first added space below, or on the fourth line (a); and on the bass staff it stands on the third line, or on the second added space above (b). When other clefs are used, the position of D is different. See clef. (3) The key-note of the key of two sharps (c). (4) On the keyboard of the organ or pianoforte, the white key or digital included in each group of two black keys. (5) The string in a stringed instrument that is tuned to the tone D, as the third string of the violin, etc. (b) In chem., D is the symbol of didymum. (c) In math., d is the sign of differentiation, ∂ of partial differentiation, δ of variation, D of derivation (commonly in the sense of taking the differential coefficient), Δ of differencing, and ∇ of the Hamiltonian operator. Many analysts avoid the use of the letter in other senses than these. A letter subjoined to any of these signs of operation shows what is taken as the independent variable, and exponents show the number of times the operations are to be performed. Differentiation (especially when relative to the time) was formerly indicated in England by a dot over the sign of the quantity to be differentiated, this being the notation of Newton's fluxional calculus. (d) In the mnemonic words of logic, the sign of reduction to darii.—4. As an abbreviation: (a) In Eng. reckoning (d, or d.), an abbreviation of denarius, the original name for the English penny; as, £ s. d., pounds, shillings, and pence; 2s. 1d., two shillings and one penny. (b) Before a date (d.), an abbreviation of died. (c) In dental formulas, an abbreviation of deciduous, prefixed without a period to the letters i, c, and m: thus, di, deciduous incisor; dc, deciduous canine; dm, deciduous molar: all being teeth of the milk-dentition of a diphyodont mammal. Thus, the milk- or deciduous dentition of a child is expressed by the formula or, more simply, taking one half of each jaw only, di 2, dc 1, dm 1,  $\frac{1}{2} \times 2 = 10$ . In either case the numbers above the line are those of the upper teeth, and those below the line of the under teeth. See dental. (d) In anat. and ichth. (d, or D), an abbreviation of dorsal (vertebra or fin, respectively). (e) In a ship's log-book (d.), an abbreviation of drizzling.

dab (dab), n. [(1) ME. -d, -dr, -d, etc.; see -ed. (2) ME. -d, -ed: see -ed.] A form of -ed, -ed, in certain words. See -ed, -ed. dat, n. A Middle English form of doat. daalder (dāl'dēr), n. [D: see dollar.] A former Dutch silver coin and money of account; a dollar.

The Memmisho hem *dabbe*th o the het bare Flemish Insurrection ('Child's Ballads, VI. 272).

2. To strike gently with the hand; slap softly; pat.—3. To pat or tap gently with some soft or moist substance: specifically, in etching, china-painting, etc., to pat or rub gently with a dabber, so as to diffuse or spread evenly a groundwork of color, etc.; smear.

A sore should never be wiped by drawing a piece of tow or rag over it, but only by dabbing it with fine lint Sharpe, Surgeon.

4. To strike with a pointed or sharp weapon; prick; stab.

There was given him the anngell of Sathan, the pricke of the flesh, to dabbe him in the necke. Sir T. More, Works, p. 651.

5. To dabble. [Prov. Eng.]—6. To deceive. 'Til like the parish bull he serves them still, And dabbes their husbands clean against their will. The Times & Whistle (E. T. S.), I. 2402.

7. In stone-working, to pick holes in with a pointed tool; fret.—To dab about, to kiss. Dab new with her now and then. The Cookman's Courtship, p. 6.

II. intrans. 1. To prick. The thorn that dabbe I'll cut it down, Though fair the rose may be. R. Jamieson's Pop. Ballads, I. 87.

2. To peck, as birds. [Scotch.] Weel daubst, Robin! there's some mair, Heath groats an' barley, dinnas spare. Mrs. J. Nicol, Poems, I. 48.

3. To use a dabber.—4. To fall down loosely. Encombrid in my clothes that dabbing down from me did droope. Phœr, Æneid, vi.

dab<sup>1</sup> (dab), n. [< ME. dabbe, a stroke, blow: see the verb.] 1. A quick or sudden blow. As he was recovering, I gave him a dab in the mouth with my broken sword. Swift, Mem. of Capt. Creighton, p. 82.

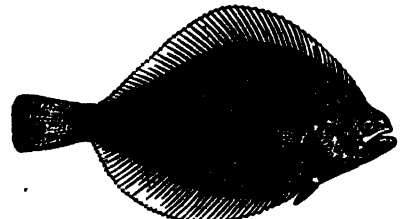

2. A gentle blow or pat with the hand or some soft substance.—3. A dig; a peck, as from the beak of a bird.—4. A first or imperfect impression on the metal in making a die.—5. A small lump or mass of something soft or moist; a small quantity; as, a dab of mortar; a dab of butter.—6. A trifle; a slight, insignificant thing or person; in contempt.

Cutting the leaves of a new dab called Anecdotes of Polite Literature. Walpole, Letters, II. 387.

dab<sup>2</sup> (dab), n. [Perhaps a particular use of dab<sup>1</sup>, n., 5.] The salt-water flounder or fluke, Limanda limanda. The teeth are compressed and truncated, and the lateral line is simple and arched above the pectoral; the dorsal has 70 to 76 rays and the anal 52 to 57;

Dab (Limanda limanda).

the color is brownish, sometimes relieved by yellowish spots. The dab is a common fish on the sandy parts of the British coast, living in deeper water than the true flounder, and not entering the mouths of rivers. It seldom exceeds 12 inches in length, and is preferred to the flounder for the table.

Almost immediately he had a basket of dabs and whitings. Froude, Sketches, p. 75.

dab<sup>3</sup> (dab), n. and a. [Origin uncertain; perhaps connected with dab<sup>1</sup> and dabble.] Usually supposed to be a 'corruption' of adept. I. n. An expert; a knowing or skillful man; a dabster. [Colloq.]

I am no dab at your fine sayings. Sterne, Tristram Shandy, iv. 15.

One writer . . . excels at . . . a title-page, another works away at the body of the book, and a third is a dab at an index. Goldsmith, The Bee, No. 1.

II. a. Clever; skilled; as, a dab hand at a thing. [Colloq.]

da ballo (dā bāl'lō). [It.: da, < L. de, of, from; ballo, ball: see ball.] In music, in the style of a dance; in a light and spirited manner.

dabber<sup>1</sup> (dab'ēr), n. One who or that which dabs. Specifically.—(a) In printing, same as ball<sup>1</sup>, q. (b) An instrument consisting of a mass of cotton wool sewed or tied in silk or leather and with or without a wooden handle, used by etchers to spread and unite grounds laid on metal plates; by copperplate- and wood-engravers to ink the surface of wood blocks and engraved plates, in order to take impressions from them, and by painters on china to produce smooth backgrounds in color.

dabbler (dab'ler), n. 1. One who dabbles or plays in water, or as in water.—2. One who dabbles in or dips slightly into some pursuit, business, or study; a superficial worker or thinker.

In matters of science he [Jefferson] was rather a dabbler than a philosopher.

Theodore Parker, Historic Americana, p. 283.

dabblingly (dab'ling-ly), adv. In a dabbling manner; as a dabbler.

dabby (dab'i), a. [dabli + -y.] Moist; soft; adhesive. [Local.]

dabchick (dab'chik), n. [A var. of dobchick, dopchick.] 1. A newly hatched or unfledged chick.

As when a dab-chick waddles through the coysse
On feet and wings, and flies, and wades and hops
Pope, Dunciad, li. 68

Hence—2. A delectable morsel; a childish, tender, delicate person.

She is a delicate dabchick. I must have her
B. Jonson, Alchemist, iv. 1

3. A small grebe; a water-hird of the family Podicepsidae, especially applied in Europe to the Podiceps minor, the little grebe, and in the United States to the Podilymbus podiceps, the Carolina or pied-billed grebe. Also dop-chicken.

lakerlack (dab'er-lak), n. [Se.] 1. The seaweed Alaria esculenta, same as badderlocks.—2. Any wet, dirty strip of cloth or leather.—3. The hair of the head hanging in lank, tangled, and separate locks.

labbis (dab'i-tis), n. The mnemonic name given by Petrus Hispanus to that indirect mood of the first figure of syllogism in which the major premise is universal and affirmative, and the minor premise and conclusion are particular and affirmative. These distinctions of quantity and quality are indicated by the three vowels of the word, a, i, i. The letter s at the end shows that the mood is reduced to direct reasoning by simply converting the conclusion, while the letter d at the beginning shows that the mood to which this reduction leads is darii.

laboya (da-boi'), n. [E. Ind.] A venomous

Daboia russelii.

Indian serpent of the genus Daboia, especially D. russelii.

dabster (dab'ster), n. [< dab + -ster.] 1. One who is skilled; one who is expert; a master of his business; a dab. [Colloq.].—2. A dabbler; a bungler. [Colloq. and rare.]

The second kind of hyena, called papio or dabuh
Topse (1838)

dab-wash (dab'woah), n. A small wash, done after the regular family wash. [Prov. Eng.]

That great room itself was sure to have clothes hanging to dry at the fire, whatever day of the week it was; some one of the large irregular family having had what was called in the district a dab-wash of a few articles forgotten on the regular day.

Mrs. Gaskell, Sylvia's Lovers, vi.
da capella (dä kä-pel'la), [It.: da, < L. de, of, from; capella, a chapel; see chapel, n.] In music, a direction to play a piece or passage in church style—that is, with solemnity; in a stately manner.

da capo (da kä'po), [It., from the beginning: da, < L. de, of, from; capo, < L. caput = E. head: see caput.] In music, a direction to repeat from the beginning; usually abbreviated to D. C. The end of the repeat is generally indicated by the word fine. Da capo al fine, a direction to repeat from the beginning to the sign fine.—Da capo al segno, a direction to repeat from the beginning to the sign ♯.

dace (däse), n. [Early mod. E. also dacer, darex; < ME. darex, darn, < OF. dars, a dace, same as dart, darz, a dart (ML. nom. dardus); E. dard, a dace, ML. acc. dardum, whence also E. dar, dare, a dace; so called from its swiftness: see dart.] 1. A small fresh-water cyprinoid fish of Europe, Leuciscus vulgaris or Squalius laietanus, resembling and closely related to the roach and chub. It has a stout fusiform shape, pharyngeal teeth in two rows, and a complete lateral line. It chiefly inhabits the deep and clear waters of quiet streams in Italy, France, Germany, etc., and some of the rivers of England. It is gregarious and swims in shoals. It seldom exceeds a pound in weight, but from its activity affords the angler good sport. Also called dar, dare, and dart.

Dace (Leuciscus vulgaris)

Let me live harmlessly, and near the brink
Of Trent or Avon have a dwelling place.
Where I may see my quill or cork down sink
With eagle's bite of perch, or bleak, or dace.
J. Davers, quoted in I. Walton's Complete Angler, i. 1.

2. A name of sundry similar or related fishes. (a) In some parts of the United States, a cyprinoid fish of the genus Rhinichthys, distinguished by the projection and blackish color of the prenasal region. (b) The redfin, Mimulus cornutus.

Dacelo (da-sel'o), n. [NL. (W. E. Leach, 1816), a transposition of L. alcedin, a kingfisher: see Alcedo.] The typical genus of birds of the subfamily Iacoroninae. D. gigas is the large Australian species known as the laughing-jackass.

Dacelonina (da-sel'o-ni-nä), n. pl. [NL., < Dacelo (n.) + -ina.] One of the two subfamilies of Alcedinidae, having the bill more or less depressed, with smooth, rounded, or sulcate culmen; the insectivorous, as distinguished from the piscivorous kingfishers. There are about 14 genera and upward of 80 species, which feed for the most part upon insects, reptiles, and land-mollusks, instead of fish. All are old-world birds; some are African and family Iacoroninae. D. gigas is the large Australian species known as the laughing-jackass.

Asiatic, but most inhabit the Australian, Papuan, and Oceanic regions. Leading genera are Dacelo, Alcedo, Pungia, and Cryps.

dacey (dä'si), n. The usual name in Bengal, and in sericultural works, of a race of silkworms of which there are eight annual generations.

The silkworm yielding eight crops is found in Bengal, and is there called dacey.

L. P. Brockett, Silk-weaving, p. 12.

dachshund (G. pron. daks'hönt), n. [G., < dachs, badger, & hund = E. hound.] The German badger-dog; a breed of short-legged, long-bodied dogs used to draw or bait badgers.

Dacian (dä'sian), a. and n. [< L. Dacia, the province so called, < Daci = Gr. Δάκται. The L. adj. was Dacus or Dacicus, rarely Dacius.] 1. a. Pertaining or belonging to the Daci, an ancient barbarian people, or to their country, Dacia, made a Roman province after their conquest by Trajan (A. D. 104), comprising part of Hungary, Transylvania, nearly all of Rumania, and some adjacent districts.

There were his young barbarians all at play,
There was their Dacian mother, he, their sire,
Butchered to make a Roman holiday.
Byron, Child Harold, iv. 141.

II. n. One of the Daci; a native of Dacia.

In the time of Trajan were executed the reliefs which represent his victory over the Dacians.

C. O. Müller, Manual of Archaeol. (trans.), § 202.

dacite (dä'sit), n. [< Dacia (see Dacian) + -ite.] A name first used by Fr. Von Hauer and Stache, in 1863, in describing the geology of Transylvania, to include the varieties of greenstone-trachyte which contain quartz. Dacite consists essentially of plagioclase and quartz, together with one or more minerals belonging to the biotite, hornblende, and pyroxene families. The ground mass is very variable in structure and character, but rarely occurs except in a more or less altered form, and is especially interesting as being one of the rocks associated with occurrences of the precious metals and then even in Transylvania and the Cordilleran regions of North and South America. It is a rock the composition and classification of which has been the cause of much discussion among geologists. See rhyolite.

dacity (das'i-ti), n. A contraction of audacity.

I have played a major in my time with as good dacity as ere a lubly horse on 'em all.
Sampson, Vow Breaker

dacker, daker (dak'er, dä'ker), v. [E. dial. and Sc. (usually spelled dacker), also decker, docker; origin obscure; cf. (OFlem. dackerren, move quickly, move to and fro, vibrate.) I. intrans. 1. To go about in a careless, aimless, or feeble manner; loiter; saunter.

I'en dacker on wi the family frae years end to years end
Scott, Rob Roy, vi

I'll pay your thousand pund Scots . . . gin ye'll . . . just dacker up the gate wi' this hame-nach.
Scott, Rob Roy, xlii.

2. To labor after the regular hours.—3. To traffic; truck.—4. To engage; grapple.

I dacker'd wi' him by myself.
Poems in the Buchan Dialect, p. 7.

5. To search, as for stolen or smuggled goods.

The Nevtians will but doubt be here,
To dacker for her as for robbed gear.
A. Ross, Helenore, p. 91

II. trans. To search; examine; search for (stolen or smuggled goods): as, to dacker a house.

dacker, daker (dak'er, dä'ker), n. [< dacker, daker, v.] A dispute; a struggle.

Dacne (dak'nä), n. [NL., irreg. < Gr. δάκναι, bite, sting.] 1. A genus of elaterid beetles. In its original application it was nearly the same as the modern family Cryptophagidae; in a restricted sense it includes those Cryptophagidae which have the antennae ending in a large orbicular or ovoid and compressed mass. 2. A genus of tetramerous beetles, of the family Erotylidae: same as Engis.

Dacnidae (dak-nid'-dä), n. pl. [NL., < Dacnis (n-id), 1, + -idae.] A family of birds, typified by the genus Dacnis: synonymous with Corvidae. Cabanis, 1850.

Dacninae (dak-ni-di-nä), n. pl. [NL., < Dacnis (n-id), 1, + -inae.] A subfamily of Corvidae, typified by the genus Dacnis, containing pitpits with a straight and acute bill and mandibles of equal length. It contains the genera Dacnis, Certhidea, Hemidacnis, Xenodacnis, Conirostrum, and Oreomanes.

daconidine (dak-ni-din), a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Dacninae.

Dactylis (dák'tis), n. [NL. (Cuvier, 1817), in reg. < Gr. dákylis, bit, sting.] 1. A genus of birds conterminous in Cuvier's classification with the modern family Dactylidae or Corobidae; the pipits or honey-creeper. It is now restricted to a section of that family having as typical species Certhia caryocarpus and C. spiza of Linnaeus, containing upward of 15 species, of which blue is the prevailing color, all inhabiting tropical continental America.

2. A genus of North American worm-eating warblers, of the family Mniotiltidae. Bonaparte, 1828.

dactyl, dactylage, etc. See daktot, etc.

dactyl, n. See diktos.

dactyl (dák'til), n. A tree of the genus Dacrydium.

Dacrydium (dák-rid'i-um), n. [NL., < Gr. dákrydion (dim. of dákryon = E. tear), applied to a kind of seamy, in NL. use referring to the resinous drops exuded by the plants.] A genus of evergreen gymnospermous trees, belonging to the natural order Taxaceae. There are about 10 species, natives of the Malay archipelago, Tasmania, and New Zealand, some of which are valuable timber-trees, as D. Frankii, the Huon pine of Tasmania, and D. cupressinum, the rimu or red pine of New Zealand. D. taetotum of New Zealand is also a large tree.

dacryololus (dák-ri-je-ló'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. dákryon (> dákryon, weep) = E. tear, + lólus, laughter, < yláw, laugh.] In pathol., alternate laughing and weeping.

dacryo-adenitis (dák-ri-ó-ad-e-ní'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. dákryon, = E. tear, + ádén, gland, + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of a lacrymal gland.

dacryocystitis (dák-ri-ó-sis-tí'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. dákryon, = E. tear, + káystis, vessel (cyst), + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the lacrymal sac.

dacryolite, dacryolith (dák-ri-ó-lit, -lith), n. [< Gr. dákryon, = E. tear, + lithos, a stone.] A lacrymal calculus; a concretion in the lacrymal canal or tear-duct.

dacryolithiasis (dák-ri-ó-lith-iá'sis), n. [NL., < dacryolith + -iasis.] In pathol., the morbid condition in which dacryoliths are produced.

dacryoma (dák-ri-ó-má), n. [NL., < Gr. dákryon, = E. tear, + -oma.] In pathol., the stoppage or obstruction in one or both of the puncta lacrymalia (tear-passages), by which the tears are prevented from passing into the nose, and in consequence run down over the lower eyelid.

dacryon (dák-ri-on), n. [NL., < Gr. dákryon, ppr. of dákrye, weep, < dákryon, dákrye, a tear (cf. dákryma = L. lacrum, lacryma, a tear) = E. tear, q. v.] The point where the frontal, lacrymal, and superior maxillary bones of the human skull meet. See craniometry.

dacryops (dák-ri-ops), n. [NL., < Gr. dákryon, = E. tear, + ops, eye, face.] In pathol.: (a) A cystiform dilatation of one of the ducts of the lacrymal gland. (b) A watery eye.

dactyl, dactyle (dák'til), n. [< L. dactylus, < Gr. dáktylos, a finger, a dactyl, a date (whence ult. E. date, q. v.), akin to L. digitus, a finger (see digit), and E. toe, q. v. The dactyl appears to have been so called because, like a finger, it consists of one long and two short members.]

1. A unit of linear measure; a finger-breadth; a digit: used in reference to Greek, Egyptian, and Babylonian measures. The Egyptian dactyl was precisely one fourth of a palm, and was equal to 0.14 inch, or 18.7 millimeters. The Babylonian and Assyrian dactyls are by some authors considered as the fifth part, by others as the sixth part, of the corresponding palm. The ordinary Greek dactyl was one fourth of a palm, and its value in Athens is variously calculated to be from 1.85 to 1.98 centimeters.

2. In pros., a foot of three syllables, the first long, the second and third short. The dactyl of modern or accentual versification is simply an accented syllable followed by two which are unaccented, and is accounted a dactyl without regard to the relative time taken in pronouncing the several syllables. Thus, the words cheerily, worldly, violet, and cally, which on the principles of ancient metrics could be called respectively a dactyl (— — —), a tribach (— — —), a Cretic (— — —), and an anapest (— — —) are all alike regarded as dactyls. The quantitative dactyl of Greek and Latin poetry is tetrasyllabic—that is, has a magnitude of four morae (see metre); and as two of those constitute the thesis (in the Greek sense) and two the arsis, the dactyl, like its inverse, the anapest (— — —), belongs to the equal (isochronous) class of feet. The true or normal dactyl has the locus or musical stress on the first syllable (— — —). Its most frequent equivalent or substitute is the dactylic spondee (— — —), in which the two short times are contracted into one long. Resolution of the long syllable (— — —) is rare.

If ye use too many dactyls together ye make your music too light and of no solemn gravity, such as the amorous Elegies in court naturally require.

Puttenham, Art of Eng. Poems, p. 108.

From long to long in solemn sort Slow spondee stalks; strong spondee yet ill able Ever to come up with Dactyl tripartite.

Coleridge, Metrical Foot.

3. In anat.: (a) A digit, whether of the hand or foot; a finger or a toe. (b) A toe or digit of the hind foot only, when the word digit is restricted to a finger.—4. In sociol., a dactylus.—5. The piddock, Pholas dactylus. See dactylus (c).—6. Mollis dactylus, a series of cyclic dactyls with a trochee in the first place. See loquax.—Anapestic dactyl, a dactyl substituted for an anapest, and consequently taking the locus on its second syllable (— — —) for (— — —).—Cyclic dactyl. See cyclic, 2.

dactyl (dák'til), v. i. [< dactyl, n.; in allusion to the rapid movement of dactylic verses.] To move nimbly; leap; bound. B. Jonson.

dactylar (dák'til-ár), a. [< dactyl + -ar.] Pertaining to a dactyl; dactylic.

dactyle, n. See dactyl.

dactyleti (dák'til-et), n. [< dactyl + dim. -eti.] A little or false dactyl.

How handsomely besets Dull spondee with the English dactyleti!
By Hall, Nature, I. vi 14

Dactylethra (dák-til-é-thrá), n. [NL., < Gr. dáktylithra (also dáktylithron), a finger-sheath, a thumb-screw, < dáktylos, a finger: see dactyl, n.] A genus of tailless amphibians, constituting the family Dactylethridae. D. capensis inhabits South Africa.

Dactylethridae (dák-til-é-thríd-é), n. pl. [NL., < Dactylethra + -idae.] A family of aglossal, anurous, salient amphibians, represented by the single genus Dactylethra. It contains African frogs without a tongue, with a concealed tympanic membrane, maxillary and premaxillary teeth, webbed hind feet, and claws on the three inner toes, from which latter character the name of the genus is derived. The sacral diapophyses are dilated, and the coracoids and procoracoids are subequal, strongly divergent, and connected by a broad, double, not overlapping cartilage. Also called Xenopodidae.

Dactyli (dák'til-i), n. pl. [L., < Gr. dáktylos (< dáktylos, of Ida, in Crete): see def. Cf. dactyl, n.] In classical antiqu., a class of mythical beings, guardians of the infant Zeus, inhabiting Mount Ida in Phrygia or in Crete, to whom the discovery of iron and the art of working it were ascribed. They were servants or priests of Cybele, and are sometimes confounded with the Curetes, the Corymbes, and the Corymbantes. The traditions about them and their place of abode vary.

dactyli, n. pl. Plural of dactylus.

dactylic (dák'til-ik), a. and n. [< L. dactylicus, < Gr. dáktylikos, < dáktylos, a dactyl: see dactyl.] 1. a. In pros., constituting or equivalent to a dactyl; pertaining to or characteristic of a dactyl or dactyls; consisting of dactyls: as, a dactylic foot; a dactylic spondee; dactylic rhythm or meter; dactylic verses. The dactylic rhythm in classical poetry was regarded as especially majestic and dignified, a continuous sequence of dactyls, however, produced a relatively lighter and more animated effect, an admixture of spondees giving a more or less heavy or retarded movement to the verse. The most frequent dactylic meter is the hexameter. Other dactylic meters were used in Greek lyric poetry, and in the drama, especially in the earlier period, or in passages expressing lamentation (monodies and oemias). See hexameter and elegiac.

This at least was the power of the spondee and dactylic harmony.
Johnson, Rambler, No. 84.

Inspired by the dactylic beat of the horses' hoofs, I essayed to repeat the opening lines of Evangelina.
Lowell, Fire-side Travels, p. 106.

Dactylic class (of feet), dactylic foot. See dactyl, n. Dactylic flute, a flute characterized by unequal intervals.—Dactylic spondee. See dactyl, 2.

II. n. 1. A line consisting chiefly or wholly of dactyls.—2. pl. Meters which consist of a repetition of dactyls or of equivalent feet.

Dactylobranchia, Dactylobranchiata (dák-til-i-ó-brang-ki-á, -brang-ki-é-tá), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. dáktylos, a finger-ring, + bráchyra, gills.] An order of tunicates with a branchial sac of two gills girt anteriorly by a membranous ring and open posteriorly. It is represented by the Pyrosomatidae, or fire-bodies. Also, erroneously, Dactylobranchia.

dactyloglyph (dák-til-i-ó-glif), n. [< Gr. dáktylos, a finger, an engraver of gems, < dáktylos, a finger-ring (< dáktylos, a finger: see dactyl), + yláw, cut, engrave.] An engraver of finger-rings, or of fine stones such as those used for rings. Also dactyloglyphist.

dactyloglyphic (dák-til-i-ó-glif-ik), a. [< dactyloglyph + -ic.] Having relation to or of the nature of dactyloglyphy. Also dactyloglyphic.

dactyloglyphist (dák-til-i-ó-glif-ist), n. [< dactyloglyph + -ist.] Same as dactyloglyph.

dactyloglyphy (dák-til-i-ó-glif-í), n. [< Gr. dáktylos, a finger-ring, < dáktylos, a finger: see dactyl, n.] The art of engraving rings, and hence of engraving fine stones like those used for finger-rings. See dactyloglyph.

dactylographer (dák-til-i-ó-grá-fér), n. [< Gr. dáktylos, a finger-ring, + gráphō, write, + -er.] One who studies or describes finger-rings; hence, by extension, one who describes engraved stones.

dactylographic (dák-til-i-ó-grá-fik), a. [< dactylographer + -ic.] Relating to or of the nature of dactylography.

dactylography (dák-til-i-ó-grá-fí), n. [< Gr. dáktylos, a finger-ring, + gráphō, write.] The science or study of finger-rings; a description of or an essay upon finger-rings, or, by extension, upon engraved gems.

dactylogy (dák-til-i-ó-glí), n. [< Gr. dáktylos, a finger-ring, + lógos, < lógos, speak: see -ology.] Same as dactylography.

dactylomania (dák-til-i-ó-man-í), n. [< Gr. dáktylos, a finger-ring, + mania, divination.] Divination by means of a finger-ring. There are many modes, some in use in parts of Europe to this day: in all either a magic ring is used, or an ordinary finger-ring, in which some part of the spirit of the wearer is supposed to linger, and the movements of which are supposed to indicate his feelings or future actions.

The classical dactylomania, of which so curious an account is given in the trial of the conspirators Patricius and Hilarus, who worked it to find out who was to supplant the emperor Valens. A round table was marked at the edge with the letters of the alphabet, and with prayers and mystic ceremonies a ring was held suspended over it by a thread, and by a swinging or stopping towards certain letters gave the responsive words of the oracle.

E. B. Tylor, Prim. Culture, I. 118.

dactylon (dák-til-i-on), n. [NL., < Gr. dáktylon, neut. of dáktylos, prop. adj. (< dáktylos, a finger-ring), < dáktylos, finger: see dactyl.] 1. In surg., cohesion between two fingers, either congenital or as a consequence of burning, ulceration, etc.—2. A chiroplast or finger-gymnasium invented in 1835 by Henri Herz, for the use of pianoforte-players.

dactylotheca (dák-til-i-ó-thé-ká), n.; pl. dactylothecae (-é). [NL., < Gr. dáktylōthēka, a collection of gems, < dáktylos, a finger-ring, + thēka, case, repository.] A collection of finger-rings, kept for their interest or rarity, or of engraved gems similar to those of rings, especially of Greek and Roman origin.

Dactylis (dák'til-is), n. [NL., < L. dactylis (also dactylon), a sort of grass (cf. dactylus, a sort of grass). < Gr. dáktylos, a sort of grass (cf. dáktylos, a kind of plant), < dáktylos, finger: see dactyl.] A genus of grasses, of about a dozen species, growing in the cooler temperate regions of the old world. D. glomerata is a valuable meadow grass of Europe and the United States, known as orchard-grass from its growing well in the shade, and as cockfoot-grass from the one-sided arrangement of its dense spikelets. It is a tall and rather stout perennial, with a tendency to form tussocks, yielding excellent hay, and making fine pasturage when grown with other grasses.

dactylist (dák'til-ist), n. [< dactyl + -ist.] One who writes dactylic verse.

May is certainly a sonorous dactylist
T. Norton, Pref. to Milton's Smaller Poems.

Dactylomys (dak-til'ō-mis), n. [NL., < Gr. dactylōs, finger, + mys, mouse.] A genus of hystricomorphic rodents, of the family Acto-

Hedgehog rat (Dactylomys tylops)

dontidae and subfamily Echimyinae, peculiar to South America. D. tylops, the leading species has a long scaly tail and lacks the spines in the pelage which most of this group of hedgehog rats possess.

dactylonomy (dak-ti-lōn'ō-mi), n. [Gr. dactylōs, finger, + nomos, a law, rule; cf. vōmos, law: see nomē.] The art of counting or numbering on the fingers.

dactylopedite (dak-ti-lōp'ē-dīt), n. [Gr. dactylōs, a finger or toe, + podē (pod-), = E. foot, + -ite.] In crustaceans, the seventh and last (distal) segment of a limb; a dactylus. It is the last segment of a developed endopodite, succeeding the propodite, forming in a chelate limb, as of the lobster, with a process of the propodite, the nippers or pincers of the claw. See out under endopodite.

Dactylopora (dak-ti-lōp'ō-rā), n. [NL., < Gr. dactylōs, finger, + poros, passage.] The typical genus of the family Dactyloporidae.

dactylopore (dak'ti-lō-pōr), n. [Gr. dactylōs, finger, + poros, passage, pore.] In zoöl.: (a) The pore or opening of a dactylozoid in the hydrocoralline hydrozoans, as millepore coral. Moseley, 1881. (b) A foraminifer of the family Dactyloporidae.

dactyloporic (dak'ti-lō-pōr'ik), a. [Gr. dactylōs, finger, + poros, passage.] Of or pertaining to a dactyloporic.

Dactyloporidae (dak'ti-lō-pōr'ī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Dactylopora + -idae.] A family of imperforate milioline foraminifers.

Dactylopteris (dak'ti-lōp'ter'ī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Dactylopterus + -idae.] A family of mail-cheeked fishes, typified by the genus Dactylopterus. They have a distinct short spinous dorsal and a short soft dorsal and anal, and the pectorals are divided into a small upper and very long lower portion, and are expandible in a horizontal direction. The species are capable of long flying leaps from the water. Cephaloscyllium is a synonym.

dactylopteroid (dak-ti-lōp'tē-roid), a. [Gr. dactylōs, finger, + pteron, wing, + -oid.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Dactylopteridae.

dactylopterous (dak-ti-lōp'ter'us), a. [Gr. dactylōs, finger, + pteron, wing, + -ous.] In zool., having several inferior rays of the pectoral fin free, in part or entirely; specifically, pertaining to or having the characters of the genus Dactylopterus.

Dactylopterus (dak-ti-lōp'ter'us), n. [NL.: see dactylopterous.] A genus of acanthopterygian fishes, typical of the family Dactylopteridae.

Flying Gurnard (Dactylopterus volitans)

having the pectoral fins enormously enlarged and wing-like, and divided into two portions. D. volitans is the flying gurnard, also called flying fish, a name shared by the members of another family, Xenodermidae. Cephaloscyllium is a synonym.

dactylorhiza (dak'ti-lō-rī-zā), n. [NL., < Gr. dactylōs, finger, + rhiza, root.] Finger-and-toe, a disease of the roots of turnips, causing them to divide and become hard and useless. It is believed to be due to the nature of the soil, and is distinct from anbury, which is caused by the attacks of insects.

Dactyloscopidae (dak'ti-lōs-kōp'ī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Dactyloscopus + -idae.] A family of fishes, represented by the genus Dactyloscopus. They have an elongated sauriform body, cuboid or sub-cuboid head, fringed opercles, very wide branchial apertures, a long single dorsal with its anterior portion spinous, and approximated ventrals with a spine and 3 rays each. The species are of small size, and inhabitants of the warm American seas.

Dactyloscopus (dak-ti-lōs-kō-pus), n. [NL., < Gr. dactylōs, finger, + scopus, view; cf. trascopus.] A genus of fishes, typical of the family Dactyloscopidae, and distinguished by finger-like or inarticulate ventral rays.

dactylose (dak'ti-lōs), a. [Gr. dactylōs, finger: see dactyl.] In bot., same as dactylloid.

dactylothea (dak'ti-lō-thē-kā), n. [NL., < Gr. dactylōs, finger, + thēa, a case: see theca.] In ornith., the integument of the toes of a bird; the horny, leathery, or feathered covering of the toes. [Little used.]

dactylous (dak'ti-lus), a. [As dactylose.] In zoöl., and anat., of or pertaining to a dactyl.

dactylosoid (dak'ti-lō-sō'id), n. [Gr. dactylōs, finger, + zōon, animal.] In zoöl., an occasional elongated appendage of hydrozoans, devoid of a mouth and gastric cavity, and having a simple tentacular function: so called from its shape.

Besides the constant nutritive polyps and medusoid gonophores, there are in constant modified polyps or medusoids. These are the mouthless worm-like dactylosoids which are provided with a tentacle, which has no lateral branches or aggregations of nematocytes. Claus, Zoology (trans.), I, 246

dactylus (dak'ti-lus), n. pl. dactyli (-li). [NL., < Gr. dactylōs, finger, toe: see dactyl.] 1. In zoöl.: (a) In tristylar, the last segment of the normally 7-jointed leg; a dactylopedite. It is the movable claw of the two that make the nipper or chelate claw. (b) In entom., one or all of the tarsal joints which follow the first one in any insect, when, as in a bee, for example, the first joint is much larger than the rest and known as the metatarsus or planta. In bees this first joint is different in structure as well as size from the rest, and is specifically called the propodea. When the large first joint is called the planta, the dactylus is known as digitus, as in Kirby and Spence's nomenclature. The use of dactylus in this sense is by Burmeister and his followers. (c) In conch., a piddock, Pholas dactylus.

It is the property of the dactylus (a fish so called from its strong resemblance to the human nail) to shine brightly in the dark. Pliny, Nat. Hist. (trans.), ix, 87.

2. In anat. See digitus, 1.

Dacus (dä'kus), n. [NL., < Gr. daknos, an animal of which the bite is dangerous, < daknō, bite.] A genus of dipterous insects, of the family Muscidae, or flies. D. oleæ is a species injurious to the olive.

Dahlia (dā'hi-lī), n. [NL., < Dahl, a Swedish botanist.] 1. A genus of plants, natural order (Compositae), of which several species are known, all natives of Mexico and Central America. It is nearly allied to the northern genus Adonis. D. variabilis was introduced into Europe from Mexico early in this century. In its native state the flowers are single, with a yellow disk and dull scarlet rays. Under cultivation there have been developed a multitude of forms, varying in height, in foliage, and especially in the beautiful colors and forms of the flowers. The plant is unable to endure frost, and is perpetuated by its tuberous roots, which are taken up for the winter. Two or three other species are sometimes cultivated.

2. [l. c.] A plant of the genus Dahlia.

daimio (dā'myō), n. [Chino-Jap., < dai, great, + mio, name.] The title of the chief feudal barons or territorial nobles of Japan, vassals of the mikado: distinguished from the shōmō ('little name'), the title given to the hatamoto, or vassals of the shōgun. See shōgun. Though exercising independent authority in their own domains, the daimios acknowledged the mikado as the legitimate ruler of the whole country. During the Tokugawa shōgunate (1603-1868) the daimios gradually became subject to the shōguns, who compelled them to live in Yedo, with their families and a certain number of their retainers, for six months of every year, and on their departure for their own provinces to leave their families as hostages. The number of daimios differed at different times, according to the fortunes of war and the caprice of the shōguns. Just before the abolition of the shōgunate there were 265, arranged in five classes, with incomes ranging from 10,000 to 1,000,000 koku of rice per annum. In 1871 the daimios surrendered their lands and privileges to the mikado, who granted pensions proportioned to their respective revenues, and relieved them of the support of the samurai, their military retainers. These pensions have since been commuted into active bonds, redeemable by government within thirty years from date of issue. The title has been abolished, and that of kurozoku bestowed upon court and territorial nobles alike. See kurozoku.

Wher as he doth but dalliennly perawde, they may enforce & compel.

Bp. Bale, Image of the Two Churches, ii.

dalmahoy (dal'ma-hoi), n. [Origin obscure.] A kind of bushy bob-wig worn by tradesmen in the eighteenth century, especially by chemists.

Dalmatian (dal-má-shian), a. and n. [< Dalmatia + -ian.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to Dalmatia, a crownland of the Austrian empire, on the eastern coast of the Adriatic sea.—Dalmatian cap, an old name for the tulip.—Dalmatian dog. See dog.—Dalmatian pelican, the great tufted pelican, Pelecanus crispus: so called from having been first brought to notice through a specimen killed in Dalmatia in 1823. A. E. Brehm.—Dalmatian regulus, the yellow-browed warbler of Europe, Regulus, Reguloides, or Phylloscopus superciliosus.

II. n. 1. An inhabitant of Dalmatia; specifically, a member of the primitive Slavic race of Dalmatia (including the Morlaks of the coast), akin to the Servians, and constituting most of the population.—2. A Dalmatian dog (which see, under dog).

dalmatic (dal-mat'ik), n. [Also dalmatica and, as F., dalmatique; = F. dalmatique = Sp. dalmática = Pg. It. dalmatica, < ML. dalmatica (sc. L. restis, garment), fem. of L. Dalmaticus, adj., < Dalmatia: see def.] A loose-fitting ecclesiastical vestment with wide sleeves, provided with an opening for the passage of the head, divided or left partly open at the sides, and reaching to or below the knee. It is worn in the Western Church by the deacon at the celebration of the mass or holy communion and on some other occasions, and is put on over the alb. Bishops also use the dalmatic, wearing it over the tunicle and under the chasuble. The earliest records of the dalmatic as a secular garment seem to date from the latter part of the second century, at which time it is also alluded to as the 'sleeved tunic of the Dalmatians (colitridota Dalmatarum).' It afterward came to be especially worn by senators and other persons of high station. The first mention of its use by a bishop is in the case of St. Cyprian, martyred A. D. 258.

But one or two . . . bent their knee to Rictor Magdalen, by which name they saluted her—kissed her hand, or even the hem of her dalmatic.

Scott, Abbot, xiii.

Of or pertaining to the city of Damascus, anciently and still the capital of Syria, and under the Omniad caliph capital of the Mohammedan empire, long celebrated for its works in steel. See damascus.—2. [I. c.] Of or pertaining to the art of damascening, or to something made by that process.

Damascene workers, chiefly for ornamenting arms.

G. C. M. Birdwood, Indian Arts, I. 141.

Damascene lace, an imitation of Honiton lace, sometimes made by uniting strips of real Honiton lace with brides or other filling of needlework. Damascene work. (a) Same as damascening. (b) The style of work displayed in the artistic watered-steel blades for which the city of Damascus is celebrated. The variegated color of these blades is due to the crystallization of cast-steel highly charged with carbon, an effect produced by a careful process of cooling. The phrase is also applied to ornaments slightly etched on a steel surface, and also to other surfaces of similar appearance, as, for example, to an etched surface of metallic iron.

II. n. 1. An inhabitant or a native of the city of Damascus.

In Damascus the governor under Aretas the king kept the city of the Damascenes with a garrison. 2 Cor. xi. 32. 24. [L. Damascena, < Gr. Δαμασκηνή, the region about Damascus, prop. fem. of the adj.] The district in which Damascus is situated.

Lo, Adam, in the feld of Damascus, damascus, and cf. damashcon, damascos. As an adj., def. 3, directly < Damascus.] I. n. 1. A textile fabric woven in elaborate patterns. (a) A rich fabric of coarse silk threads woven in figures of many colors: a manufacture which has been long established in Syria and has frequently been imitated in Europe. (b) A modern material, used chiefly for furniture-covering, made of silk and wool or silk and cotton, and usually in elaborate designs. (c) An inferior quality of the preceding, made of worsted only, employed also for furniture. (d) A fine twilled linen fabric, used especially for table-linen. It is generally ornamented with a pattern shown by opposite reflections of light from the surface without contrast of color. (e) A cotton fabric made for curtains, table-covers, etc., usually in different shades of red. 2. A pink color like that of the damask rose; a highly luminous crimson red reduced in chroma, and not appearing to incline to either orange or purple.

Just the difference
Betwixt the constant red and mingled damask
Shak., As you like it, iii. 5.

3. Same as damascening, 2.—4. Wavy lines shown on metal, formed by damascening.—Capra damask, a material mentioned in the sixteenth century, perhaps named from the export of Caffa or Kaffa, anciently called Theodosia, on the southern coast of the Crimea.—Cotton damask. See cotton, a.—Cypress damask. See cypress.

II. a. 1. Woven with figures, like damask: used of textile fabrics, usually linen: as, damask table-cloths. See I., 1.

A damask napkin wrought with horse and hound.
Tennyson, Audley Court.

2. Of a pink color like that of the damask rose.

She never told her love,
But let her conquest, like a worm I the bud,
Feed on her damask cheek.
Shak., T. N., ii. 4.
While, dreaming on your damask cheek,
The dewy sister-eyelids lay.
Tennyson, Day-Dream, Prol.

3. Of, pertaining to, or originating in Damascus: as, the damask plum, rose, steel, violet: see below.—Damask plum, a small plum, the damson.—Damask rose, a species of pink rose, Rosa damascena, a native of Damascus.

damask (dam'-sək), v. t. [MLG. damaskon = G. damanten = F. damasser = Sp. Pg. damascar (in pp. damascado) = It. damascare, damask; from the noun. (Cf. damascene.] 1. To ornament (a metal) with flowers or patterns on the surface, especially by the application of another metal. See damascene.

Mingled metal damask'd o'er with gold Dryden, Æneid, xi. 736

2. To variegate; diversify.

If you could pick out more of these play-particles, and, as occasion shall salute you, embroider or damask your discourse with them.

B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, iii. 3.
On the soft downy bank damask'd with flowers.
Milton, P. L., iv. 334.

damasked (dam'-sək), p. a. [Pp. of damask, v. t.]

1. Having a ruining figure covering the surface, as in damask or damascened metal.

This place [Damascus] is likewise famous for cutlery ware, which . . . is made of the old iron that is found in ancient buildings: . . . the blades made of it appear damasked or watered.

Pocock, Description of the East, II. i. 125.

Brant of Paris, employed cast steel and carburetted steel, and he got a damasked blade after acidulated washing.
N. and Q., 6th ser., XI. 352.

2. In her., decorated with an ornamental pattern, as the field or an ordinary. [Rare.]

damascene (dam'-sē-nē), v. t. [Early mod. E. also damashin: = MD. damasceneren, < F. damasquiner, damask, flourish, carve, engrave or otherwise ornament damaskwise, < damasquin, of damask (= Sp. Pg. damasquino = It. damascino, dammaschino, of damask, formerly also as a noun, damask, damask-work), < damas (= It. damasco, etc., < ML. damascus), damask. Damascen (not used as an adj. in E.) thus ult. represents F. damasquin, formed anew as an adj. from damas (in E. as if < damask + -in) and meaning 'relating to damask.' It has been confused in part with damascene, which is of much older origin and means 'relating to Damascus.' To ornament (metal, as steel), by inlaying or otherwise, in such a way as to produce an effect compared (originally) with that of damask: ornament with flowers or patterns on the surface; damask.

Cuppes of fine Corinthian latten, gilded and damasked.
Purposes, Pilgrimage, p. 307.

damascening (dam'-sē-nīng), n. [Verbal n. of damascene, v. t.] 1. The art of ornamenting a surface of one metal by inlaying with another. A surface of iron, steel, or bronze is first engraved with lines and figures, the incisions being more or less undercut—that is, broader at the bottom than at the surface. The metal used for the ornamental pattern is then usually inlaid in the form of a narrow ribbon or strip, which is driven into its place by blows of a mallet, the whole surface is then polished. Also called damascene work.

2. An effect produced by repeatedly welding, drawing out, and doubling up a bar composed of a mixture of iron and steel, the surface of which is afterward treated with an acid. The surface of the iron under this treatment retains its metallic luster, while that of the steel is left with a black, firmly adhesive coating of carbon. Howse and Schorlemmer. Also damask, damasking.

damaskint, v. t. An obsolete form of damascene. damaskint, n. [Var. of damascene, after damaskin, v.] A Damascus blade; a damascened blade.

No old Toledo blades or damaskins.
Howell, Poem to Charles I., Jan. 1, 1641.

damasking (dam'-sē-king), n. [Verbal n. of damask, v. t.] 1. Same as damascening.—2. Adornment with figures.

An opinion that no clothing so adorned them as their painting and damasking of their bodies.
Spenser, Ancient Britains, V. vii. 7.

3. Wavy lines formed on metal by damascening, or lines similar in appearance.

But above all conspicuous for these works and damaskings is the maple.
Evelyn, To Dr. Wilkins.

damassé (da-ma-sā'), a. [F., pp. of damasser, damask: see damask, n. and v.] 1. Woven with a rich pattern, as of flowers: said of certain silks used for women's wear.—2. In ceram., applied to a decoration white on white—that is, painted in white enamel on a white ground, so that the pattern is relieved by only very slight differences of tint, and chiefly by the contrast of surfaces.

damassin (dam'-sē-sin), n. [Cf. F. damascher, damask: see damask, v.] 1. A kind of damask with gold and silver flowers woven in the warp and woof.—2. An ornamental woven or textile fabric of which the surface is wholly, or almost wholly, gold or silver, or a combination of both. The fabric is submitted to heavy pressure to make the surface uniform and brilliantly metallic.

damboard (dam'-bōrd), n. [Sc.] Same as damboard.

dambonite (dam'-bōn-ī-tē), n. [Cf. dambo, native name for the tree, + -ite.] A white crystalline substance existing to the extent of 0.5 per cent. in caoutchouc, obtained from an unknown tree growing near the Gaboon in western Africa. It is very readily soluble in water and in aqueous, but not in absolute, alcohol.

dambose (dam'-bōs), n. Same as dambonite.

damboard (dam'-bōrd), n. [See also dambo, to E. board damboard; < Sw. dambräde (= Dan. dambræt), checker-board, < dam (= Dan. dam), checkers (see dam), + bräde (= Dan. bræt, board: see board.] A chess- or checker-board.—Damboard pattern, a large pattern, resembling the squares on a checker-board.

dame (dām), n. [ME. dame, often dam, a lady, a woman, a dam (see dam), = D. G. Dan. dame = Sw. dam, < (OF. dame, F. dame = Pr. Sp. Pg. Chaucer, Miller's Tale, l. 74.

3. A woman of rank, high social position, or culture; a lady; specifically, in Great Britain, the legal title of the wife or widow of a knight or baronet.

Not all these lords do vex me half so much
As that proud dame, the lord protector's wife.
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., I. 3.

4. A woman in general: particularly, a woman of mature years, a married woman, or the mistress of a household: formerly often used (like the modern Mrs.) as a title, before either the surname or the Christian name.

Where shall we find leash or band,
For dame that loves to rove?

Scott, Marmion, l. 17.

One old dame

Came suddenly on the Queen with that sharp news.
Truncheon, Lancet and Elaine.

5. The mistress of an elementary school.

He bewailed his awful course of life, his disobedience to his parents, his slighting and despising their instructions and the instructions of his dame, and other means of grace God had offered him.

Winthrop, Hist. New England, II 60.

Like many others born in villages, he [Robert Hall] received his first regular instruction at a dame's school that of Dame Scotland.

Gregory.

6. In Eton, England, a woman with whom the boys board, and who has a certain care over them; sometimes, also, a man who occupies the same position.

Eton is less symmetrical than the other two, in so far as she retains Dames' houses, cheaper than tutors' houses. About one hundred and thirty boys board with Dames. Sydney Smith, in C. A. Bristed's English University, p. 338.

Dame Joan ground. See ground.

dameiselle, n. An obsolete form of damsel.
damenisation (dā-mō-ni-zā'shən), n. [Also written damenization; < dā + me + ni + (-)ze + -ation.] In music, the use of the syllables da, me, ni, po, fa, la, be, to indicate the successive tones of the scale, or the singing of a melody by the help of these syllables; advocated by the composer Graun about 1750. See solmisation, bobtation, etc.

damer (dā'mēr), n. A darning-needle. [Obsolete or provincial.]

dame-school (dām'sköl), n. An elementary private school taught by a woman.

His [Mr. Odger's] boyish education was limited to the rustic dame-school of his native hamlet.
R. J. Hinton, Eng. Radical Leaders, p. 330.

dame's-violet (dāmz'vī'ō-let), n. An English popular name of the plant Heperis matronalis. Also called damask violet. See rocket.

damiana (dam-i-ā'nā), n. A drug consisting of the leaves of certain Mexican plants, species of Turner, chiefly T. micropylla and T. diffusa, and Bigneloria veneta, supposed to have tonic and stimulant properties.

Damianist (dā'mi-an-ist), n. [< Damian + -ist.] Same as Damianite.

Damianite (dā'mi-an-īt), n. [< Damian + -ite.] Ecclesiastical, a follower of Damianus, a Monophysite patriarch of Alexandria in the sixth century, who denied the separate Godhead of the persons of the Trinity, teaching that Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are God only when united.

damer, n. The Cape pigeon, Daption capense.

dammar (dam'gr), n. [Also damar; < Hind. dāmar, resin, pitch; see dammar-resin.] Same as dammar-resin.

Dammara (dam'ā-rā), n. [NL., also Damara; < dammar, q. v.] 1. A genus of large dicocious coniferous trees to which the earlier name Agathis has been restored. They are natives of the East Indian islands, New Guinea, and New Zealand, have large lanceolate leathery leaves, and bear ovate or globose cones with a single laterally winged seed under each scale. There are 8 or 10 species. D. orientalis is a tall tree, attaining on the mountains of Amboyna a height of from 80 to 100 feet. Its light timber is of little value, but it yields the well-known dammar-resin. Another species is D. australis, the kauri-pine of New Zealand, which is sometimes 300 feet high, and affords a very strong and durable wood, highly esteemed for masts and the planking of vessels and for house-building, and often richly mottled. It yields a large quantity of resin, which is also found buried in large masses on sites where the tree no longer grows. (Other useful species are D. obtusa of the New Hebrides, D. Morris of New Caledonia, etc.)

2. [l. c.] Same as dammar-resin.

dammaroit, n. [Appar. a var. of dameret; < OF. dameret, a lady's man, a carpet-knight; < dame, lady; see dame.] An effeminate person; a lady's man.

The lawyer here may learn divinity,
The divine, laws or fair astrology,
The dammaroit respectively to fight,
The duellist to court a mistress right.

Deloe's Anecdotes of Literature, VI. 51.

dammar-gum (dam'gr-gum), n. Same as dammar-resin.

dammaric (dam'gr-ik), a. [< Dammara + -ic.] Relating to or derived from trees of the genus Dammara. Dammaric acid, the part of dammar-resin which is soluble in alcohol and has acid properties.

dammarin (dam'gr-in), n. [< dammar + -in.] Same as dammar-resin.

dammar-pitch (dam'gr-pitch), n. White dammar.

dammar-resin (dam'gr-res-in), n. A gum or resin resembling copal, produced by various resinous Dammara. From Indian or cat's-eye species.

See East.

resin is obtained from D. orientalis, and when mixed with powdered bamboo-bark and a little chalk is used for caulking ships. Another variety, the kauri-gum, is obtained from D. australis of New Zealand; it is colorless or pale-yellow, hard and brittle, and has a faint odor and resinous taste. Both gums are used for colorless varnish, for which purpose they are dissolved in turpentine. Also dammar-resin, dammar-gum, dammar, dammarin, dammar, damar, dammer. — Black dammar-resin, of southern India, a product of Canarium strictum, of the natural order Burseraceae. — White dammar-resin, a product of Vateria Indica, used in varnish on the Malabar coast in India. Also called Indian copal or pinu resin.

damme (dam'e), intery. A coalesced form of damn me, used as an oath.

Come, now; shall I begin with an oath? Do, Sir Lucius, let me begin with a damme. Shenando, The Rivals, III. 4.

dammer (dam'ēr), n. One who dams up water, or who builds dams.

dammer (dam'ēr), n. Same as dammar-resin.
damn (dam), v. [< ME. dampnen, usually dampnen, < OF. dampner, dampner, damer, dampner, often dampner, dempner, F. dampner = Pr. dampnar = OSP. damnar, dakar = Pg. damnar = It. dannare, condemn, damn (cf. OHG. firdamnon, MHG. verdamnen, G. verdammen, damn), < L. dannare, condemn, fine, < dannum, loss, harm, fine, penalty; see damage, and cf. condemn.] L. trans. 1. To condemn; affirm to be guilty, or worthy of punishment; sentence judicially.

He that doubteth is damned if he eat. Rom. xiv. 23.

Lifting the flood up to high Honours seat,
And the Evil damning evermore to dy.
Spenser, To G. Harvey.

In some part of the land these serving-men (for so be these damned persons called) do no common work; but as every private man needeth labours, so he cometh into the market-place, and there hireth some of them for meat and drink.
Sir T. More, Utopia, tr. by Robinson, l.

2. To assign to a certain fate; doom.

Dampned was to dye in that prison.
Chaucer, Monk's Tale, l. 425.

The youngest dame to forests fled,
And there is dampned to dwell.
Gauequign, Philomene (ed. Arbet), p. 110.

Specifically—3. In theol., to doom to punishment in a future state; condemn to hell. [For this word, as used in this sense in the authorized version of the Bible, the word condemn has been substituted in the revised version. See damnation.]

He that believeth not shall be damned. Mark xvi. 16.

That which he continues ignorant of, having done the utmost lying in his power that he might not be ignorant of it, shall not damn him. South, Sermons.

Hence—4. In the imperative, used profanely in emphatic obijuration or contempt of the object, and more vulgarly in certain arbitrary phrases (as damn your or his eyes!) in general reprehension or defiance of a person.

Ay, ay, it is all very true; but, hark ee, Rowley, while I have, by heaven I'll give; so damn your economy.
Sheridan, School for Scandal, IV. 1.

5. To address with the obijuration "damn!"; swear at.

He scarcely spoke to me during the whole of the brief drive, only opening his lips at intervals to damn his horse.
Charlotte Brontë, The Professor, II.

6. To adjudge or pronounce to be bad; condemn as a failure; hence, to ruin by expressed disapproval; as, to damn a play. [Chiefly in literary use.]

For the great dons of wit,
Phobus gives them full privilege alone
To damn all others, and cry up their own.
Dryden, Indian Emperor.

Damn with faint praise, assent with civil leer,
And without sneering teach the rest to jeer.
Pope, Prolog. to Satires, l. 201.

To damn a bond or a deed, to cancel it.

II. intrans. To use the obijuration "damn!"; swear.

damn (dam), n. The verb damn used as a profane word; a curse; an oath.

Ay, ay, the best terms will grow obsolete. Damus have had their day.
Sheridan, The Rivals, II. 1.

Not to care a damn, to be totally indifferent. [Slang. (cf. curse).] — Tinker's damn, trooper's damn, something absolutely worthless. [Slang. (cf. curse).]

damna, n. Plural of damnum.

damnability (dam-na-blī'ti), n. [< ML. damnabilitas (-is), < LL. damnabilis; see damnabile.] The state or quality of deserving damnation; damnableness.

The deadlyness, or, as men might say, . . . the damnability belonging to the mortal offence.
Sir T. More, Works, p. 488.

damnable (dam'na-bl), a. [< ME. dampnable, < OF. dampnable, F. dampnable = Pr. dampnable = OSP. dampnable, dañable = It. dannabile, < LL. damnabilis, worthy of condemnation, < L. dannare, condemn; see damn.] 1. To be condemned; worthy of condemnation; productive of harm, loss, or injury.

And yet this way be foul, it is damnable,
And neither pleasant, neither profitable.
Pelladius, Husbondrie (A. A. T. S.), p. 6.

2. Worthy of damnation.

O thou damnable fellow! did not I pluck thee by the nose for thy speeches? Shak., M. for M., v. 1.

A creature unprepared, unmeet for death;
And to transport him in the mind he lies
Were damnable. Shak., M. for M., IV. 2.

Doctrines which once were damnable are now fashionable, and heresies are appropriated as aids to faith.
G. H. Lewes, Frodo. of Life and Mind, I. l. § 1.

3. Entailing damnation; damning.

The mercy of God, if it be rightly applied, there is nothing more comfortable; if it be abused, as an occasion to the flesh, there is nothing more damnable.

Hieron, Works (ed. 1694), I. 185.

4. Odious; detestable; abominable; outrageous. [Regarded as profane.]

Now shall we have damnable ballads out against us,
Most wicked madrigals.
Fletcher, Humorous Lieutenant, II. 2.

damnableness (dam'na-blī-nes), n. The state of being damnable, or of deserving condemnation.

The question being of the damnableness of error.
Chillingworth, Religion of Protestants.

damnably (dam'na-blī), adv. 1. In a manner to incur severe censure, condemnation, or damnation.

They do cursedly and damnably as yet Crist.
Chaucer, Parson's Tale.

2. Odiously; detestably; abominably. [Regarded as profane.]

I'll let thee plainly know, I am cheated damnably.
Fletcher, Rule a Wife, v. 2.

damnation (dam-nā'shən), n. [< ME. dampnation, < OF. dampnation, dampnation, dampnation, etc., F. dampnation = Pr. dampnation = OSP. damnation, dañacion = Pg. dannação = It. dannazione, < L. dannatio (-n-), condemnation, < dannare, pp. dannatus, condemn, damn; see damn, and cf. condemnation.] 1. Condemnation; adverse judgment; judicial sentence; doom.

Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye devour widows' houses, and for a pretence make long prayer; therefore ye shall receive the greater damnation.
Mat. xxiii. 14.

And shall come forth: they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation.
John v. 29.

In the commonly misunderstood sentence in the 'Communion Office, sent from 1 Cor. x. 20, eat and drink our own damnation, the latter word is used in its simple sense of judgment.

[This is the sense in which the word is used in the authorized version of the New Testament: in the revised version, in some passages condemnation (Mat. xxiii. 14; Mark xii. 40), in others judgment (Mat. xxiii. 33; John v. 29; 1 Cor. xi. 29), is substituted for it.]

Specifically—2. In theol., condemnation to punishment in the future state; sentence to eternal punishment.

He that hath been afflicted with the fears of hell, or remembers how often he hath been spared from an horrible damnation, will not be ready to strangle his brother for a trifle.
Jer. Taylor, Worthy Communicant.

3. Something meriting eternal punishment.

Besides, this Duncan Hath borne his faculties so meek, hath been So clear in his great office, that his virtues Will plead like angels, trumpet-tongued, against The deep damnation of his taking-off.
Shak., Macbeth, I. 7.

4. The act of censuring or condemning by open disapproval, as by hissing or other expression of disapprobation.

Don't lay the damnation of your play to my account.
Fielcing, Joseph Andrews.

5. Used as a profane expletive. [Low.]

damnatory (dam'na-tō-rī), a. [*< ML. *damnatorius*, < L. damnatus, pp. of dannare, damn; see damn.] Containing a sentence of condemnation; assigning to damnation; condemnatory; damning; as, the damnatory clauses of the Athanasian creed.

Honiface was in the power of a prince who made light of his damnatory invectives. Hallam, Middle Ages, VII. 2.

damned (damd), p. a. [Pp. of damn, v.] 1. Condemned; judicially sentenced; specifically, (reputed to be) sentenced to punishment in a future state; consigned to perdition.

But although all damned persons at the great day will be confounded and ashamed, yet some will be more ridiculously miserable than such who go to Hell for fashion's sake.
Stillingfleet, Sermons, I. xii.

2. Hatful; detestable; abominable; a profane obijuration, also used adverbially to express more or less intense dislike; as an adverb also simply intensive, equivalent to 'very,' 'exceedingly,' employed to strengthen an adjective used in either reprehension or approbation, and in sound often shortened to dam. In literary use often printed d—d.

What a damned Epicurean race is this!

Shak., M. W. of W., II. 2.

damnable (dam-ni'f'ik), a. [= OF. damnable, < L. damnosus, harm, loss, damage, + facere, do, make. Cf. damnify.] Procuring or causing loss or injury; mischievous. damnable (dam-ni'f'ik-bl), a. [< damnify (cf. damnable) + -able.] Same as damnable.

God and nature gave men and beasts these natural instincts or inclinations to provide for themselves all those things that are profitable and to avoid all those things which are damnable.

T. Wright, Passions of the Mind, II. 5.

damnification (dam-ni-si-kä'shon), n. [< damnify: see -fy and -ation.] Damage inflicted; that which causes damage or loss.

damnify (dam-ni-fi), v. t.: pret. and pp. damned, ppr. damning. [< OF. damnifier, damnifier = L. damnosus, harm, loss, damage, + facere, do, make. Cf. damnable, doing injury: see damnable.] To cause loss or damage to; hurt in person, estate, or interest; injure; endamage; impair. [Now rare except in legal use.]

This little hath been very much damned at two several times; first by Attila, . . . who destroyed it; secondly by Egiolphi.

Coryat, Crudities, I. 130.

If such an one be not our neighbor, then we have no relation to him by any command of the second table, for that requires us to love our neighbor only, and then we may deceive, beat, and otherwise damny him, and not sin.

Winthrop, Hist. New England, II. 138.

They acknowledge the power of the Englishman's God . . . because they could never yet have power . . . to damny the English either in body or goods.

Boyle, Works, III. 330.

damning (dam'ning), p. a. [Ppr. of damn, v.] That condemns or exposes to condemnation or damnation: as, damning proof; damning criticism.

damningness (dam'ning-ness), n. Tendency to bring damnation.

He may vow never to return to those sins which he hath had such experience of, for the emptiness and damningness of them, and so think himself a complete penitent.

Hammond, Works, I. 20.

damnoset (dam'nös), a. [< L. damnosus, full of injury, injurious, also passively, injured, < damnum, injury.] Hurtful; harmful. Bailey, 1727. damnosity (dam-nös'i-ti), n. [< damnoset + -ity.] Hurtfulness. Bailey, 1727.

damnum (dam'num), n.; pl. damna (-nä). [L.: see damage.] In law, a loss, damage, or harm, irrespective of whether the cause is a legal wrong or not.—Damnum absque injuria, damage without wrong, as the harm caused by an accident for which no one is legally responsible.

Damocles (dam-ō-klē's), a. Relating to Damocles, a flatterer, who, having extolled the happiness of Dionysius, tyrant of Syracuse, was placed by the latter at a magnificent banquet, with a sword suspended over his head by a single hair, to show him the perilous nature of that happiness: hence applied to any condition, especially one of eminence, threatened with extreme danger.

damocleset, n. See damocles.

damon, n. Same as damon.

damonico (dä-mō-nō'kō), n. A pigment consisting of a compound of burnt sienna and Roman ochre. It is more russet in color than Mars orange, is quite transparent, and is durable. Also called moncolor.

damocel, n. See damocel.

damouch (da-mōch'), n. The Arab name for Nitraria tridentata, believed by some to be the lotus-tree of the ancients.

damourite (da-mūr'it), n. [After a French chemist, Damour.] A variety of muscovite or potash mica, containing considerable combined water, which is given off upon ignition. See mica.

damocel, n. See damocel.

damp (damp), n. [*< ME. *damp* (inferred from the verb) = D. damp = M.G. LG. damp, vapor, smoke, steam, = M.H.G. tampf; dampf, vapor, smoke, G. dampf, vapor, steam, = Dan. damp, vapor, = Sw. dial. damp-en, damp, Sw. damp (for **damp*), dust (Icel. dampur, dampur, steam, is mod. and borrowed); akin to Icel. dumba = Norw. dumba, mist, fog, = Sw. dumba, formerly dumba, mist, haze; also to G. dampf, damp, dull, (of sound) low, heavy, muffled, D. dampig, damp, hazy, misty; all from the verb repr. by M.H.G. dampfen (pret. dampf), reek, smoke, = Sw. dial. damba, reek, steam. Cf. Gr. ripen, smoke, ripen, smoke, vapor, ripen, a storm, Skt. dāpa, incense.] 1. Moist air; humidity; moisture.

It is evident that a damp being but a breath or vapour, and not to be discerned by the eye, ought not to have this epithete (darbe). Pusttenham, Arts of Eng. Poets, p. 214.

Night . . . with black air Accompanied; with damp and dreadful gloom.

Milton, P. L., x. 848.

2. A poisonous vapor; specifically, in mining, a stifling or poisonous gas. See black-damp, fire-damp.

Look not upon me, as ye love your honours!
I am so cold a coward, my infection
Will choke your virtues like a damp rise.

Fletcher, Honours, IV. 3.

3. A fog.

And, when a damp
Fell round the path of Milton, in his hand
The Thing became a trumpet; whence he blew Soul-animating strains—alas! too few.

Wordsworth, Misc. Sonnets, II. 1.

4. A check; a discouragement.

This made a damp in ye business, and caused some distraction.

Bradford, Plymouth Plantation, p. 29.

To have owned any fixed scheme of religious principles, would have been a mighty damp to their [scoffers'] imaginations.

By. Atterbury, Sermons, I. v.

5. Depression of spirits; dejection.

The disappointments which naturally attend the great promises we make ourselves in expected enjoyments strike no damp upon such men.

Steele, Tatler, No. 211.

The damp, dampness.

My Lady Yarmouth is forced to keep a constant fire in her room against the damp.

Walpole, Letters, II. 177.

damp (damp), a. [< damp, n.; cf. G. dampf, D. dampig, damp, under the noun.] 1. Moist; humid; moderately wet: as, a damp cloth; damp air.

Wide anarchy of Chaos damp and dark.

Milton, P. L., x. 288.

In some of the *damp*est ravines tree-ferns flourished in an extraordinary manner. Darwin, Voyage of Beagle, II. 238.

The air is damp, and hush'd, and close. Tennyson, Song.

2. Clammy.

She said no more: the trembling Trojans hear,
'Tis spread with a damp sweat and holy fear.

Dryden, Æneid, VI. 85.

3. Dejected; depressed. [Rare.]

All these and more came flocking, but with looks Downcast and damp.

Milton, P. L., I. 522.

=SYN. 1. Humid, Dank, etc. See moist.
damp (damp), v. [(a) In more lit. sense 'moisten' first in mod. E. (= D. dampen = G. dampfen = Dan. dampke, reek, smoke); from the noun. (b) < ME. dampen, extinguish (= D. dampen = M.H.G. dampfen, dampen = M.H.G. dampfen, G. dampfen = Dan. dampo = Sw. dämpa, extinguish, smother, deaden), a secondary verb, causal of the orig. verb whence the noun damp is derived: see damp, n. Cf. dampen.] 1. trans. 1. To moisten; make humid or moderately wet; dampen.

In vain the clouds combine to damp the sky,
If thou thy Face's sunshine dost display.

J. Beaumont, Psyche, I. 180.

He died, the sword in his mailed hand,
On the holiest spot of the Blessed Land,
Where the cross was *damp*ed with his dying breath.

Hallock, Alwrick Castle.

2. To extinguish; smother; suffocate.

Al was *damp*ed & don, & drowned by theme.

Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), II. 989.

3. To suffocate with damp or foul air in a mine. [Eng.]—4. To check or retard the force or action of: as, to damp a fire by covering it with ashes; especially, to diminish the range or amplitude of vibrations in, as a piano-string, by causing a resistance to the motions of the vibrating body. Both the vibrations and the vibrating body are said to be *damp*ed. Usually applied to acoustic vibrations, but also to slower oscillations.

5. To make dull or weak and indistinct, as a sound or a light; obscure; deaden.

Another Nymph with fatal Pow'r may rise,
To damp the sinking Beams of Cella's Eye.

Prior, Cells to Damon.

6. To depress; deject; discourage; deaden; check; weaken.

Those of yours who are now full of courage and forwardness would be much *damp*ed, and so less able to undertake so great a burden.

Winthrop, quoted in Bradford's Plymouth Plantation, p. 264.

I do not mean to wake the gloomy form
Of superstition dressed in wisdom's garb
To damp your tender hopes.

Abramside.

Shall I own to you that my joy at hearing of your health and arrival here, by your neighbour Acres, was somewhat *damp*ed by his dwelling much on the high spirits you had enjoyed in Devonshire.

Sheridan, The Rivals, II. 2.

The want of confidence in the public councils *damp*ed every useful undertaking, the success and profit of which may depend on a continuance of existing arrangements.

A. Hamilton, Federalist, No. 62.

Specifically—7. To diminish or destroy the oscillation of (a metallic body in motion in a magnetic field). When a conductor is moved in a magnetic field, or when a magnet is moved in the vicinity of a conductor, there will be, in general, an induced current generated which will oppose the motion to which it is due. The moving body will act as if immersed in a viscous liquid, and will more quickly come to rest. Advantage is taken of this fact in stilling the vibrations of a magnetic needle in a galvanometer or a compass by placing masses of conducting metal near the vibrating body. Damping is also accomplished by attaching to the needle a disk, cylinder, or vane, which swings in a liquid or in air.

[Dampen is now more common in the literal sense, and is sometimes used in the derived senses.]

=SYN. 1. To moderate, allay, dissipate.

II. intrans. In hort., to rot or waste away, as the stems and leaves of seedlings and other tender plants, when the soil and atmosphere in which they are vegetating are too wet or cold: with off: as, flower-seedlings in hotbeds are especially liable to damp off.

dampen (damp'en), v. [< damp + -en. Cf. damp.] I. trans. 1. To make damp or humid; apply moisture to; wet slightly; damp: as, the grass was dampened by a slight shower; to dampen clothes for ironing.—2. To put a check or damper upon; make weak or dull; dim; deaden. See damp.

In midst himself dampens the smiling day.

P. Fletcher, Purple Island, VII.

II. intrans. To become damp.

dampener (damp'nér), n. One who or that which dampens; a damper.

The copper block acts as a dampener.

Sci. Amer., N. S., LVII. 290.

dampier (damp'pér), n. [< damp + -er; = D. demper, etc.] 1. One who or that which dampens. (a) A mechanical device for checking action in something with which it is connected. (1) A metal plate pivoted at the center or sliding in guides in the flue of a stove, range, or furnace of any kind, and used to control combustion by regulating the draft. Some forms of dampers are designed to be controlled by automatic regulators, which are operated either by the heat of the fire directly (by contraction or expansion of a metal) or, when connected with a steam-bolter, by the pressure of the steam. (2) In the pianoforte, a small piece of wood or wire thickly covered with felt, which rests upon the strings belonging to each key of the keyboard. When the key is struck the damper is drawn away from the strings, but the instant the key is released the damper returns and checks the vibrations of the strings. The dampers of all the keys can be raised by pressing the damper-pedal (which see), so that the vibration of the strings can be prolonged after the finger has left the key. (3) The muffle of a brass instrument, as a horn. (4) An arrangement for arresting the vibrations of a magnetic needle. See damp, s. t., 7. (5) One who or that which depresses, dejects, discourages, or checks. [Colloq.]

Sussex is a great dampier of curiulity.

Walpole, Letters, II. 178.

This . . . was rather a dampier to my ardour in his behalf.

T. Hook, Gilbert Gurney, I. 1.

2. A kind of unfermented bread, made of flour and water, and generally baked on a stone. [Australian.]

The table upon which their meal of mutton and dampier is partaken is also formed of bark.

Colonial and Indian Exhibition (1886), p. 61.

dampier-pedal (damp'pér-ped'al), n. In the pianoforte, the pedal which raises all the dampers from the strings, so that the vibration of the strings can be prolonged after the finger has left the key, and so that other strings besides those struck may be drawn into sympathetic vibration. Sometimes called loud pedal.

damping (damp'ping), n. [Verbal n. of damp, v.] 1. In bleaching, a process by which a certain amount of moisture is added to a fabric after starching, to prepare it for finishing. Spencer, Encyc. Manuf., p. 497.—2. The process or method of retarding or stopping the action of a vibrating or oscillating body, as a magnetic needle. See damp, s. t., 7.—Damping-roller, in lithog., a roller covered with felt and cotton cloth, used to dampen the stone in lithographic printing.

dampishness (damp'ish-ness), n. A moderate degree of dampness or moistness; slight humidity.

damp-plate (damp'plät), n. In a blast-furnace, the cast-iron plate which supports the dam or dam-stone in front.

damply (damp'li), adv. In a damp manner; with dampness.

dampnet, v. t. An obsolete form of damp.

dampness (damp'ness), n. Moisture; moistness; moderate humidity: as, the dampness of a fog, of the ground, or of a cloth.

dampy (damp'pi), a. [< damp, n., + -y.] 1. Somewhat damp; moist: as, "dampy shade," Drayton.—2. Dejected; sorrowful: as, "dampy thoughts," Sir J. Hayward.—3. In coal-mining, said of air when it is mixed with choke-damp to such an extent that candles will no longer burn in it. [Eng.]

dams (dams), n. pl. [Also written damos, pl. (in sing. dam, a crowned piece: see dam), < Sw. and Dan. dam (also Sw. damspel = Dan. damspil; Sw. spel = Dan. spil, play) = D. damm (damspel) = G. dame (damspiel, damenspiel) = F. All my blood danced in me, and I knew That I should light upon the Holy Grail.
Tennyson, Holy Grail.

2. To move nimbly or quickly with an irregular leaping motion; bound up and down: as, the blow he gave the table made the dishes dance; the mote dancing in the sunbeam.

He made the bishop to dance in his boots,
And glad he could so get away.
Robin Hood and the Bishop of Hereford (Child's Ballads, [V. 207].

One red leaf, the last of its clan,
That dances as often as dance it can,
Hanging so light and hanging so high,
On the topmost twig that looks up at the sky.
Coleridge, Christabel, l.

Robbins sometimes dances and causes bad winding, and consequently strain roving.
P. Wilson, Cotton Carder's Companion, p. 107.

3. To move the body or the feet rhythmically to music, either by one's self or with a partner or in a set; perform the series of cadenced steps and rhythmic movements which constitute a dance; engage or take part in a dance.

Pray, good shepherd, what fair swain is this Which dances with your daughter?
Shak, W. T., IV. 2.

Still unaccomplish'd may the Maid be thought,
Who gracefully to dance was never taught.
Congreve, tr. of Orvid's Art of Love.

II. trans. 1. To give a dancing motion to; cause to move up and down with a jerky, irregular motion; dandle.

Thy grandaunt lov'd thee well;
Many a time he danc'd thee on his knee.
Shak, Tit. And., v. 3.

2. To perform or take part in as a dancer; execute, or take part in executing, the cadenced steps or regulated movements which constitute (some particular dance): as, to dance a quadrille or a hornpipe.

Is there one among you
Will dance this dance for me?
Sweet Willie and Fair Matory (Child's Ballads, II. 336).

3. To lead or conduct with a tripping, dancing movement.

Let the torrent dance thee down
To find him in the valley.
Tennyson, Princess, vii.

To dance a heart, to exhibit a performing heart; hence, to play the showman.

What though I am oblig'd to dance a bear, a man may be a gentleman for all that.
Goldsmith, She Stoops to Conquer, I. 2.

To dance attendance, to wait with obsequiousness; strive to please and gain favor by assiduous attentions and officious civilities.

A man of his place, and so near our favour,
To dance attendance on their lordships' pleasures.
Shak, Hen. VIII., v. 2.

Hee will waltz vpon your Staires a whole Afternoone, and dance attendance with more patience then a Gentleman Valier.

dance (dāns), n. [Early mod. E. daunder; < ME. daunder, daunder (= D. dans = MLG. lāi. dānz, dāns, lāi. dānz = Dan. dāns = Sw. dans = Icel. danz, mod. dans; also, of earlier date, MHG. and G. tānz), < OF. dāncier, dāncier, F. dāncier = Pr. dānsa = Sp. lāi. dānz = Pg. dānz; from the verb.] 1. A succession of more or less regularly ordered steps and movements of the body, commonly guided by the rhythmical intervals of a musical accompaniment; any leaping or gliding movement with more or less regular steps and turnings, expressive of or designed to awaken some emotion. The dance is perhaps the earliest and most spontaneous mode of expressing emotion and dramatic feeling; it exists in a great variety of forms, and is among some people connected with religious belief and practice, as among the Mohammedans and Hindus. Modern dances include the jig, hornpipe, etc., step dances executed by one person: the waltz, polka, schottische, etc., danced by pairs, and usually called round dances, the reel, quadrille, etc., usually called square dances, danced by an even number of pairs; the country-dance, in which any number of pairs may take part; and the cotillon or german, consisting of many intricate figures, in the execution of which the waltz-movement predominates.

For thei fonde a meadowe that was closed a-boute with wode, and fonde with ynn the feirest dauces of the worlde of ladies, and of maydenes, and knyghtes, the feireste that euer hadde thei sayn in hir lyve.
Morris (E. E. T. R.), II. 361.

Meanwhile welcome joy and feast, . . .
Tipsey dancer and jollity. Milton, Comus, l. 104.
On with the dances! let joy be unconfin'd.
Byron, Childs Harold, III. 22.

2. A tune by which dancing is regulated, as the minuet, the waltz, the cotillon, etc.—3. A dancing-party; a ball; a "hop."

It was not till the evening of the dance at Netherfield that I had any apprehension of his feeling a serious attachment. Jane Austen, Pride and Prejudice, p. 160.

A dinner and then a dance
For the maids and marriage-makers.
Tennyson, Maud, xx.

4. Figuratively, progressive or strenuous movement of any kind; a striving or struggling motion: often used by old writers in a sarcastic sense, especially in the phrases the new dances, the old dances.

He may gon in the dances
Of hem that Love list lebelly for to advance.
Chaucer, Troilus, l. 517.

Dance of death, in allegorical painting and sculpture, a subject illustrative of the universal power of death, in which a skeleton or a figure representing death is a prominent feature, very frequently met with in ancient buildings, stained glass, and decorations of manuscripts.—Dance upon nothing, a euphemism for being hanged.

Just as the felon, condemned to die, . . .
From his gloomy cell in a vision elopes,
To caper on sunny greens and alpine,
Instead of the dance upon nothing.

Wood, Miss Kilmansegg.

St. Vitus's dance, chorea.—To lead one a dance, figuratively, to lead one hither and thither in a perplexing way and with final disappointment; delude, as with false hopes; put one to much trouble.

You know very well my passion for Mrs. Martha, and what a dance she has led me. Addison, Demurrers in Love.

To lead the dance, to take the lead.

In fools [many] my passions some maketh to fall,
Of all sorrows which doth the dancer lead.

In bot., a genus of small erect or trailing shrubs of the natural order Thymeleaceae, including about 40 species of the temperate regions of Europe and Asia. Some of these are cultivated in gardens for their beauty or fragrance; others are of medicinal importance, and a few are employed in the manufacture of hemp and paper from the tough stringy bark. The most generally known species are the daphne crispata lauri D. laureola with evergreen leaves and green axillary flowers, the meserion D. mezereum with very fragrant flowers, the spurge D. genkwa and D. genkwa, a trailing shrub with a profusion of bright red colored and exquisitely fragrant flowers. The bark and the fruit of the meserion and some other species have strongly acrid properties and have been used for various purposes in medicine.

2. [< L. o] A plant of this genus. daphnetin (daf' net-in), n. [< Daphne + -et + -in] A crystalline substance derived from daphnetin, having the formula  $C_{10}H_8O_4 + H_2O$ . Daphnia (daf' ni-ā), n. [NL, < Gr. dāphnē: see Daphne.] A genus of minute fresh-water cladoceran entomostracous crustaceans, the type of the family Daphnidae, and representative of the whole order Daphnacea or Cladocera. The species are among the many small crustaceans known as water fleas. The best known species is D. pulex, the 'branch horned water flea', which is a favorite microscopic object. The head is prolonged into a snout, and is provided with a single central compound eye. It is also furnished with antennae which act as oars propelling it through the water by a series of short springs or jerks. These animals are very abundant in many ponds and ditches, and as they assume a red color in summer, the swarms which abound in stagnant water impart to it the appearance of blood.

Daphniacea (daf' ni-ā-ā), n. pl. [NL, < Daphnia + -acea.] The water-fleas as a superfamily: same as Cladocera.

daphniaceous (daf' ni-ā-āshus), a. Of or pertaining to the Daphniacea.

In some forms, as the ME., Fries., and Scand., there is confusion with a different preterit verb, ME. tharf, also darf, < AS. thearf, inf. thurfan, = OFries. thurf, inf. **thurva*, = OHG. durfan = Isel. thurfa = Goth. thaurban, have need, which in D. durren = G. durren, dare, has completely displaced the form corresponding to E. dare: see darf, tharf.] 1. To be bold enough (to do something); have courage, strength of mind, or hardness (to undertake some action or project); not to be afraid; venture: followed by an infinitive (with or without to) as object, or sometimes, by ellipsis, used absolutely.

I dare do all that may become a man,
Who dares do more, is none.

Shak., Macbeth, l. 7

And what they dare to dream of dare to do Lovel., Comm. Ode

[Originally and still often used in the third person of the present tense without a personal termination, and in such case always followed by the infinitive without to as, he dare not do it.

Lo, Conscience doth chide!

For loom of steel he dar not fight

Hymns to Virtue, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 66

I taught him how to manage arms, to dare

An enemy, to count both death and dangers

Shak., As You Like It, v. 1

I whipt him for robbing an orchard once when he was but a child —

"The farmer dared me to do it," he said, he was always so wild.

Temps., Elph.

4. To arouse; rouse. [Prov. Eng.] — I dare say, I suppose or believe, I presume, I think likely a weak affirmation, generally implying some degree of indifference in assertion or assent.

Joseph E. O. yes, I find great use in that screen.

Sir Peter T. I dare say you must, certainly Shak., School for Scandal, iv. 3

dare (där), n. [< dare, v.] 1. The quality of being daring; venturesomeness; boldness; dash; spirit.

It lends a lustre, and more great opinion,

A larger dare to your great enterprise.

Shak., I Hen. IV., iv. 1.

2. A challenge; defiance.

Scelus Pompeius

Hath given the dare to Caesar.

Shak., A. and C., l. 1.

To take a dare, to receive a challenge without accepting it. [Colloq.]

It was not consistent with the honor of such a man as Bob to take a dare; so against first one and then another quivering hero he had fought, until at length there was none that ventured any more to "give a dare" to the victor of so many battles.

E. Appleton, The Grays, x.

dare (där), v. [< ME. daren, darren, darren, more or less in fear, terrify; < Sw. darra, tremble, shiver, = Dan. dørre, tremble, quiver, vibrate, = LG. bedarven, become still, = D. be-

He still in fear; lurk in dread; especially, lie or squat close to the ground, like a frightened bird or hare; look anxiously around, as such a lurking creature.

As in a forms lye a wary hare

Chaucer, Shipman's Tale, l. 108.

3. To droop; languish.

II. trans. 1. To strike with fear; terrify; daunt; dismay.

Now me bus, as a beggar, my bread for to thigge

At dore upon dayes, that dayes me full sore

Till I come to my kyth, can I non other.

Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 13580

For I have done those follies, those mad mischiefs,

Would dare a woman.

Shak., As You Like It, iv. 1

2. To terrify and catch (larks), as by means of a mirror or a piece of red cloth, or by walking round with a hawk on the fist where they are crouching, and then throwing a net over them.

Backs'd the bush about, and there him took,

Like dard'd larks

Spenser, F. Q., VII. vi. 47

To be thus fad'd by a piece of scarlet,

Farewell nobility, let his grace go forward,

And darv us with his cap, like larks

Shak., Hen. VIII., iii. 2

dare (där), n. [< dare, v.] A mirror for daring larks.

The dare for larks, or mirror surrounded by smaller ones, over the mantel piece which exercised many commentators on the print, appears in the picture.

The Athenaeum, Jan. 22, 1893, p. 122 dare (där), n. [< Also written dar (ME.), < F. dard (pron. där), and in older form dart (and in another form darse, darce, > E. dace); all ult. identical with dari, a missile: see dace and dart.] Same as dace, l. [Local, Eng.]

Now ere he goes to the great Battle? none

Myself must tell him in that purer life.

But now it were too daring.

Temps., Guinevere.

— SYN. 1. Dauntless, undaunted, heroic daring-dot, darring-dot, n. [A phrase adopted by Spenser, in the erroneous spelling derring-do (which through him and his imitators has become familiar in literature), from Chaucer: ME. dorryng don, duryng do, etc., a syntactic sequence, consisting of dorryng, duryng, etc., mod. daring, verbal n. of dorren, durren, mod. dare, with inf. do, followed by that ('that which'), etc. The associated phrase to dorre do, in the last line of the passage from Chaucer, consists of the inf. do, depending on the inf. dorre, durre, dare. The passage in Chaucer is as follows:

And certainly in shure it is founde
That Trolous was never unto no wight,
As in his tyme, in no degre seconde,
In dorryng-don [var. duryng do, dorryng do, 16th cent. ed. daring do] that longest to a Knight,
Al myghte a gentill knowne hym of myght,
His herte ay with the fiste and with the beste
Rode pargal, to dorre don [var. durre do, dore don, 16th cent. ed. dare don] that hym leste.
Chaucer, Trolous, v. 387.]

So dark a mind within me dwells.

Tennyson, Maud, xv.

There is, in every true woman's heart, a spark of heavenly fire, which . . . beams and blazes in the dark hour of adversity.

Alone, in that dark sorrow, hour after hour crept by Whittier, Cassandra Southwick.

6. Threatening; frowning; gloomy; morose: as, a dark scowl.

All men of dark temper, according to their degree of melancholy or enthusiasm, may find converts fitted to their humors.
Addison, Travels in Italy.

So all in wrath he got to horse and went;
While Arthur to the banquet, dark in mood,
Fest, thinking "Is it Lancelot who hath come?"
Tennyson, Lancelot and Elaine.

7. Obscure; not easily perceived or understood; difficult to interpret or explain: as, a dark saying; a dark passage in an author.

What may seem dark at the first will afterward be found more plain.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity, l. 1.

What's your dark meaning, mouse, of this light word?
Shak., I. i. L., v. 2.

Wise philosophers hold all writings to be fruitful in the proportion that they are dark.
Swift, Tale of a Tub, x.

Hence—8. Concealed; secret; mysterious; inscrutable: as, keep it dark.

Day, mark'd as with some hideous crime,
When the dark hand struck down thro' time,
And cancell'd nature's book.

Tennyson, In Memoriam, lixii.

Precisely what is to be the manner and measure of our knowledge, in this fuller and more glorious revelation of the future, is not clear to us now, for that is one of the dark things, or mysteries, of our present state.
Bucknell, Sermons for New Life, p. 180.

9. Blind; sightless.

I, dark in light, exposed
To daily fraud, contempt, abuse, and wrong.
Milton, S. A., l. 73.

Dr. Heylin (author of Geography) preach'd at y<sup>e</sup> Abbey.
He was, I think, at this time quite dark, and so had been for some years.
 Evelyn, Diary, March 20, 1661.

Thou wretched daughter of a dark old man
Conduct my weary steps.
Dryden and Lee, Edipus.

10. Unenlightened, either mentally or spiritually; characterized by backwardness in learning, art, science, or religion; destitute of knowledge or culture; ignorant; uninstructed; rude; uncivilized: as, the dark places of the earth; the dark ages.

How many waste places are left as dark as Galle of the Gentiles, sitting in the region and shadow of death; without preaching Minister, without light!
Milton, Apology for Smectymnus.

The age wherein he [Homer] liv'd was dark; but he Could not want light who taught the world to see.
Sir J. Denham, Progress of Learning.

There are dark regions of the earth where we do not expect to find a righteous man.

Bibliotheca Sacra, XLIII. 430.

To enter, and his dark suggestions hide.
Milton, P. L., ix. 90.

Shame from our hearts Unworthy arts.

The fraud designed, the purposes dark.

Whittier, Eve of Election.

Dark ages. See age.—Dark days, specifically, days on which the sun is so completely obscured by clouds or dry mists that artificial lights have to be used for one or more days continuously, and day seems literally turned into night. Such a day was May 10th, 1780, in New England; and others of less extent were August 9th, 1783, and October 21st, 1816. The most remarkable case on record is the dry fog of 1783, when the sun was obscured by a bluish haze for many days in the summer, throughout Europe, northern Africa, and to some extent in Asia and North America.—Dark heat, the heat due to the invisible ultra red heat-rays of the spectrum. See spectrum.—Dark horse. See horse.—Dark moon. See moon.—Dark room, in photog., a room from which all actinic rays of light have been excluded, used in the processes connected with the sensitizing of plates for exposure, for placing the plates in and taking them from the plate-holder or dark slides in which they are transported and exposed in the camera, and for the development of the picture after exposure.

It is most essential in all photographic processes to employ what is termed a dark room. . . . This dark room is not without light, but its light is of a quality such as in no way affects the plate.
Spencer, Encyc. Manuf., p. 1836.

To keep dark, to be quiet, silent, or secret concerning a matter.

II. a. 1. The absence of light; darkness.

Till the dark was done, & the day sprang,
And the sun in his scarlet seat vipp'd lofts.
Destruction of Troy (R. E. T. S.), l. 6032.

I believe that men are generally still a little afraid of the dark.
Thoreau, Walden, p. 142.

Morn broaden'd on the borders of the dark.
Tennyson, Fair Women.

2. A dark place.

So I wilt in the wold and the wilde holts,
Sfer fru my feres, and no freike herde,
Till I drough to a derke, and the dere lost.
Destruction of Troy (R. E. T. S.), l. 2361.

It is not the shallow mystery of those small darks which are enclosed by caves and crumbling dungeons: it is the unfathomable mystery of the sunlight and the sun.
S. Lamer, The English Novel, p. 47.

3. A dark hue; a dark spot or part.

Some darks had been discovered.

darklings (därk'lings), adv. [So. darklings; <
E. darkling + adverbial suffix -s.] In the dark.

Thou wouldest fain persuade me to do like some idle wanton servants, who play and talk out their candle-light, and then go darklings to bed. Sp. Hall, Works, VII. 344.

She through the yard the nearest tak'
 An' to the kiln she goes then,
 An' darkling graipit (groped) for the banks,
 An' in the wine-clue throws them.
Burns, Halloween.

darkly (därk'li), adv. [ME. derkly, derklike,
 < AS. deorlice, < deora, E. dark, + -ly, < -ly.]
 1. In a dark manner; so as to appear dark; as a dark object or spot.

Vainly the fowler's eye
 Might mark thy distant flight to do thee wrong,
 As, darkly seen against the crimson sky,
 Thy figure floats along.
Bryant, To a Waterfowl.

What forms were those which darkly stood
 Just on the margin of the wood?
Whittier, Pentucket.

2. Blindly; as one deprived of sight; with uncertainty.

The spere lete don, ren the hed, be-forn lete goo;
 After my fewed, darkly, as man bynd.
Rom. of Parment (R. E. T. S.), I. 4478.

3. Dimly; obscurely; faintly; imperfectly.

For now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face. 1 Cor. xiii. 12.

In other great disputes it answers dubiously and darkly to the common reader. Milton, Areopagitica, p. 19.

4. Mysteriously; with sinister vagueness: as, it was darkly hinted that murder had been committed.

How darkly, and how deadly, dost thou speak!
 Your eyes do menace me. Shak., Rich. III., I. 4. darkness (därk'nes), n. [ME. derkness, darkness; < dark + -ness.] 1. The absolute or comparative absence of light, or the modification of visual sensation produced by such absence; gloom. It may be due either (a) to a deficient illumination, or (b) to a low degree of luminosity or transparency in the dark object.

Darkness was upon the face of the deep. Gen. 1. 2.
 A Province of the Centre, that hath the wel in crouyt's forayes, that men clepen Manyon, is alle covered with Darkness, with outen oyr brightnesse or light; so that no man may see no here, no no man dar entre in to hem.
Wendecore, Travels, p. 290.

Darkness might then be defined as either at rest; light as other in motion. But in reality the other is never at rest, for in the absence of light-waves we have heat-waves always speeding through it. Tyndall, Radiation, § 2.

2. Secrecy; concealment; privacy.

What I tell you in darkness, that speak ye in light.
Mat. x. 27.

Though lately we intended
 To keep in darkness what condition now Reveals. Shak., T. N., v. 1.

3. The state of being blind physically; blindness.

His eyes, before they had their will,
 Were darved into darkness in his head.
Tennyson, Godiva.

Hence—4. Mental or spiritual blindness; lack of knowledge or enlightenment, especially in religion and morality: as, heathen darkness.

Men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil. John iii. 19.

The Barbary States, after the decline of the Arabian power, were enveloped in darkness, rendered more palpable by the increasing light among the Christian nations.
Bunsen, Orations, I. 219.

Ring out the darkness of the land,
 Ring in the Christ that is to be.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, cvi.

5. The kingdom of the evil one; hell: as, the powers of darkness.

Descend to darkness and the burning lake:
 False fiend, avoid! Shak., 2 Hen. VI., I. 4.

6. The gloom and obscurity of the grave; death.

If I must die,
 I will encounter darkness as a bride,
 And hug it in mine arms.
Shak., M. for M., III. 1.

7. Obscurity of meaning; lack of clearness or intelligibility.

The use of old words is not the greatest cause of Saluster roughness and darkness.
Ascham, The Scholemaster, p. 156.

Let others therefore dread and shun the Scriptures for their darkness, I shall wish I may deserve to be reckon'd among those who admire and dwell upon them for their clearness. Milton, Church-Government, Prof.

The prince of darkness, the devil; Satan. —Syn. Darkness, Obscurity, Dimness, Gloom. Darkness is the opposite of light, physical or mental, and indicates the complete, or approximately complete, absence of it. Obscurity is the state of being overclouded or concealed through the intervention of something which obstructs or shuts out the light, causing objects to be imperfectly illuminated:
 as, the obscurity of a landscape; the style of this author is full of obscurity. Dimness is indistinctness caused by the intervention of an imperfectly transparent medium, or by imperfection in the eye of the person looking; it is specifically applied to the sight itself: as, dimness of vision. Gloom is deep shade, approaching absolute darkness, but is now much less often used in that sense, or in the sense of a corresponding darkness of mind, than to express a state of feeling akin to darkness; the lack of ability to see light ahead; deep despondency; lack of hope or joy: as, he lived in constant gloom.

Yet from those flames
 No light, but rather darkness visible.
Milton, P. L., I. 62.

Obscurity of expression generally springs from confusion of ideas. Macaulay, Maciavelli.

The stores had a twilight of dimness; the air was spely with mingled odors. G. W. Curtis, True and I, p. 62.

A change comes over me like that which befalls the traveller when clouds overspread the sky, . . . and gloom settles down upon his uncertain way, till he is lost.
Channing, Perfect Life, p. 94.

darksome (därk'sum), a. [< dark + -some.] Somewhat dark; gloomy; shadowy: as, a dark-some house; a darksome cloud. [Poetical.]

A darksome way, which no man could descry,
 That deep descended through the hollow ground.
Spenser, F. Q., II. vii. 20.

The darksome pines that o'er yon rocks reclin'd,
 They quaked all o'er with awe and fear.
J. R. Drake, Outpost Fay, p. 45.

They crouched then close in the darksome shade,
 They quaked all o'er with awe and fear.

8. Darkly (därk'li), s.; pl. darkies (-kis). [Also written, less prop., darkey; < dark + dim. -y.]

1. A negro; a colored person. [Colloq.]

darling virtues. Goldsmith, Essays, Acem.

darlingness (där'ling-nes), n. Dearness. Browning. [Rare.]

Darlingtonia (där-ling-tō'si-g), n. [NL, named after Dr. William Darlington, a botanist of Philadelphia (1753-1833).] A remarkable genus of American pitcher-plants, natural order Sarracenaceae. A single species is known, D. californica, from the mountain swamps of northern California. The leaves are trumpet-shaped, sometimes 2 feet long, with a vaulted, dilated hood, which terminates in a large hooked appendage above the contracted orifice. The under side of the leaf is winged, and a sweet secretion is found along this wing and about the orifice. The tube within is beset with rigid hairs directed downward, and the bottom is filled with a liquid which has a digestive effect upon the numerous insects that are entrapped.

Darlingtonia californica.

darn<sup>1</sup> (därn), v. t. [Prob. of Celtic origin: < W. darnio, piece, also break in pieces, tear (= Bret. darnau, divide into pieces), < darn, a piece, fragment, patch, = Corn. and Bret.
darn, a fragment, piece,
 whence prob. F. darn, a slice (of some fishes).]
 To mend by filling in a rent or hole with yarn or thread (usually like that of the fabric) by means of a needle; repair by interweaving with yarn or thread.

He spent every day ten hours in his closet, in darning his stockings, which he perform'd to admiration. Swift.

 of damnation, used as an exclamation.

darnel (där-nel), n. and a. [ME. darnel, dernel (taking the place of the earlier cockle), < F. dial. (Rouchi) darnelle, darnel, prob. so named from its (supposed) stupefying or intoxicating qualities; cf. OF. darn, stu-pefied; Sw. där-repe, also simply repe, darnel, the first syllable repr. därr, infatuate, cf. därr = Dan. daare, a fool.] 1. n. The popular name of Lolium temulentum, one of the few reputed deleterious grasses. It is sometimes frequent in the wheat-fields of Europe, and the grains when ground with the wheat have been believed to produce narcotic and stupefying effects upon the system. Recent investigations tend to prove this belief to be erroneous. The name was used by the early herbalists to include all kinds of corn-field weeds.

Darnel (Lolium temulentum).

He [the devil] every day laboureth to sow cockle and darnel. Luther, Sermon of the Plough.

Darnel, and all the idle weeds that grow
 In our sustaining corn. Shak., Lear, iv. 4.

II. a. Like darnel. [Poetical.]

No darnel fancy
 Might choke one useful blade in Furitan fields.

Darwinella (dār-wi-nel'la), n. [NL., named after Charles Darwin, + dim. -ella.] A genus of ceratose sponges, typical of the family Darwinellidae.

darwinellid (dār-wi-nel'id), n. A sponge of the family Darwinellidae.

Darwinellids (dār-wi-nel'id-s), n. pl. [NL., < Darwinella + -ids.] A family of ceratose sponges. They have large pouch-shaped flagellated chambers, communicating by means of numerous pores in their walls with inhalant cavities, and by means of one wide mouth with exhalant cavities. The ground mass is without granules and transparent, and the axis of the fibers is thick.

Darwinian (dār-wi-ni-an), a. and n. [F. Darwin + -ian.] I. a. Of or pertaining to Charles Darwin, the celebrated English naturalist, or to the theory of development propounded by him. See Darwinism.

Our artists are so generally convinced of the truth of the Darwinian theory that they do not always think it necessary to show any difference between the foliage of an elm and an oak. Ruskin, Lectures on Art, p. 106.

That struggle for existence against adverse external conditions, which . . . has been harped upon too exclusively by the Darwinian school. Darwin, Origin of World, p. 228.

Darwinian curvature. See curvature.

II. n. One who favors or accepts the theory of development or evolution propounded by Darwin. See evolution.

Darwinianism (dār-wi-ni-an-izm), n. [F. Darwin + -ism.] Same as Darwinism.

Darwinical (dār-wi-ni-kal), a. [F. Darwin + -ical.] Same as Darwinian. [Rare.]

Darwinically (dār-wi-ni-kal-ly), adv. After the manner of Darwin; as a Darwinian; in accordance with the Darwinian doctrine of development. [Rare.]

It is one thing to say, Darwinically, that every detail observed in an animal's structure is of use to it, or has been of use to its ancestors; and quite another to affirm, teleologically, that every detail of an animal's structure has been created for its benefit. Huxley, Lay Sermons, p. 304.

Darwinism (dār-wi-n-izm), n. [F. Darwin (see def.) + -ism.] 1. The body of biological doctrine propounded and defended by the English naturalist Charles (Charles Robert) Darwin (1809-1882), especially in his works "The Origin of Species" (1859) and "The Descent of Man" (1871), respecting the origin of species.

It is, in general, the theory that all forms of living organisms, including man, have been derived or evolved by descent, with modification or variation, from a few primitive forms of life or from one, during the struggle for existence of individual organisms, which results, through natural selection, in the survival of those least exposed, by reason of their organization or situation, to destruction. It is not to be confounded with the general views of the development or evolution of the visible order of nature which have been entertained by philosophers from the earliest times. (See evolution.) That which is especially and properly Darwinian in the general theory of evolution relates to the manner or methods, or means by which living organisms are developed or evolved from one another; namely, the inherent susceptibility and tendency to variation according to conditions of environment; the preservation and perfection of organs best suited to the needs of the individual in its struggle for existence; the perpetuation of the more favorably organized beings, and the destruction of those less fitted to survive; the operation of natural selection, in which sexual selection is an important factor; and the general proposition that at any given time any given organism represents the result of the foregoing factors, acting in opposition to the hereditary tendency to adhere to the type, or "breed true." See selection and survival.

2. Belief in and support of Darwin's theory.

Also Darwinism.

Darwinist (där-wîn-ist), n. [< Darwin + -ist.]

A believer in Darwinism; a Darwinian.

Darwinistic (där-wîn-istik), a. [< Darwinist + -ic.] Same as Darwinian.

Darwinism (där-wîn-izm), n. s. & pret. and pp.

Darwinized, ppr. Darwinizing. [< Darwin + -ism.] To accept the biological theories of Charles Darwin.

The last word of the scientific theory of evolution is that very terrifying word, anarchy, so eloquently anathematized "ex cathedra" by Darwinian sociologists and so many others.

Contemporary Rev., L. 485.

Darwish, n. See darwish.

Dascillidæ (da-sil-lid-æ), n. pl. [NL., < Dascillus + -idæ.] A family of serripent pentamerous beetles, typified by the genus Dascillus. They have the ventral segments free the first of which is not elongate the head not constricted behind; the eyes granulated; the mesothoracic epimeron reaching the coxae, of which the front pair is transverse and the hind pair subcylindrical for reception of the femora; and the tarsal 5-jointed. Same as Cyphonidæ.

dash (dash), v. [< ME. dachen, dassen, rush with violence, strike with violence, < Dan. daske = Sw. daska, slap, strike, beat. Cf. dash.] I. trans. 1. To strike suddenly and violently; give a sudden blow to.

With that she dash'd her on the lips,
So dy'd double red.
Hard was the heart that gave that blow,
Soft were the lips that bled
Werner, Queen Eleanor and Fair Rosamond.

2. To cause to strike suddenly and with violence; throw or thrust violently or suddenly; as, to dash one stone against another; to dash water on the face.

They shall bear thee up, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone. Mat. iv. 6

A foot more light, a step more true,
He's from the heath-flower dashed the dew.
Scott, l. of the L, i. 18.

3. To break by collision or by strokes; shatter. For he departed his shelle was all to dash that the thriddle part ne left not hool, and his hauberkis daisyed and his helme perced. Merz (E. E. T. S.), iii. 443.

A brave vessel . . .
Dash'd all to pieces. Shak., Tempest, l. 2.

4. To scatter or sprinkle something over; bespatter; sprinkle; splash; suffuse.

Vast basins of marble dashed with perpetual cascades.
And all his grooves and culms dash'd with drops Of onset.
Tennyson, Morte d'Arthur.
Dashed with blushes for her slighted love.
Addison, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph.

5. To place, make, mark, sketch, etc., in a hasty manner.

Then came a postscript dash'd across the rest.
Tennyson, Princess, v.

6. To throw something into so as to produce a mixture; mingle; mix; adulterate: as, to dash wine with water; the story is dashed with fables; to dash fire-damp with pure air (said in coal-mining: see dash).

Learn to know the great desire that hypocrites have to find one craft or other to dash the truth with.
Tyndale, Ana. to Sir T. More, etc. (Parker Soc., 1880), p. 323.

He had sent up wine so heavily dash'd that those poor men of the city who were not so much accustomed to drink as those of his retinue were extremely intoxicated.

Comical Hist. of France.

Notable virtues are sometimes dashed with notorious vices.
Sir P. Browne, Christ. Mor., l. 23.

His cheerfulness [is] dashed with apprehension.
Goldsmith, The Bee, No. 1.

7. To cast down; thrust out or aside; impede; frustrate; abate; lower.

I see, this hath a little dash'd your spirits.
Shak., Othello, iii. 3.

What lack is this, that our revels are dashed?
E. Jenson, Cynthia's Revels, iv. 1.

Could make the worse appear
The better reason, to perplex and dash Maturest counsels.
Milton, P. L., l. 114.

8. To confound; confuse; put to shame; abash: as, he was dashed at the appearance of the judge.

Dash the proud gambler in his glided car.

Pope, Imit. of Horace, II. l. 107.

To dash in, to paint or write rapidly; as, to dash in the color of the details.—To dash off, to form or sketch out hastily; write with great rapidity; as, to dash off an article for a newspaper.—To dash out, (a) To knock out by dashing against something; as, to dash out one's brains against a wall. (b) To erase at a stroke; strike out; blot out or obliterate; as, to dash out a line or a word. (c) To strike out or form at a blow; produce suddenly.

Never was dash'd out, at one lucky hit,
A fool so just a copy of a wit;
So like, that critics said, and courtiers swore,
A wit it was, and called the phantom More.

Pope, Dunciad, II. 47.

—Syn. Dash, Smash, Shatter, Shiver, Crush, Mash. That which is dashed does not necessarily go to pieces: if it is broken, the fact is commonly expressed. That which is smashed, shattered, or shivered is dashed to pieces and usually, with violence, at a blow or in a collision. Smashing is the roughest and most violent of the three acts; the word expresses the most complete disruption or ruin; as, the drunken soldier smashed (shattered, shivered) the mirror with the butt of his musket. The use of smash or crush (as, his head was smashed, I smashed my finger) is colloquial. Shatter and shiver differ in that shatter suggests rather the flying of the parts, and shiver the breaking of the substance; and the pieces are more numerous or smaller with shiver. That which is crushed or mashed is broken down under pressure; that which is washed becomes a shapeless mass: sugar and rock are crushed into powder, small particles, or bits; apples are crushed or mashed into pulp in making cider; boiled potatoes are mashed, not crushed, in preparing them for the table.

They that stand high have many blasts to shake them,
And, if they fall, they dash themselves to pieces.

Shak., Rich. III., l. 3.

A voice cried aloud, "Ay, ay, divil, all's right! We've smashed 'em" [machines]. Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, II. You may break, you may shatter the vase if you will, But the scent of the roses will hang round it still.

Moore, Farwell! but whenever, etc.

All the ground
With shiver'd armour strown.

Milton, P. L., vi. 389.

The ostrich . . . leaveth her eggs in the earth . . . and forgetteth that the foot may crush them. Job xxxix. 13-15.

To break the claw of a crab or a lobster, clap it between the sides of the dining room door; . . . thus you can do it gradually without smashing the meat.

Swift, Advice to Servants, The Footman.

II. trans. 1. To rush with violence; move rapidly and vehemently.

All the long-kept stream of life
Dash'd downward in a cataract.
Tennyson, Day-Dream, The Revival

On the 4th his [Johnston's] cavalry dashed down and captured a small pick-guard of six or seven men.
U. S. Grant, Personal Memoirs, I. 338.

2. To use rapidly in performance, so as to display force seemingly without care, as in painting or writing.

With just, bold lines he dashes here and there,
Showing great mastery with little care.
Rochester, Allusion to Horace.

dash (dash), n. [< dash, v.] 1. A violent striking together of two bodies; collision.

The dash of clouds. Thomson, Summer, l. 1114.

2. A sudden check; frustration; abashment: as, his hopes met with a dash.

Though it were Knor himself, the Reformer of a Kingdom, that spake it, they will not pardon him their dash.
Milton, Areopagitica, p. 22.

3. An impetuous movement; a quick stroke or blow; a sudden onset: as, to make a dash upon the enemy.

This jumping upon things at first dash will destroy all.
Selden, Table-Talk, p. 23.

The dash of the brook from the alder-plain.

Bryant, Two Graves

I feared it was possible that [the enemy] might make a rapid dash upon Crump's and destroy our transports and stores.
U. S. Grant, Personal Memoirs, I. 334.

4. A small infusion or admixture; something mingled with something else, especially to qualify or adulterate it: as, the wine has a dash of water.

Innocence when it has in it a dash of folly.

Addison, Spectator, No. 245.

A morose ruffian with a dash of the pirate in him.

Emerson, Compensation

5. The capacity for unhesitating, prompt action, as against an enemy; vigor in attack: as, the corps was distinguished for dash.

The hunting of Taber Sheriff and his brothers was so peratively beautiful: with an immense amount of dash there was a cool, sportsman-like manner in their mode of attack.
Sir S. W. Baker, Heart of Africa, p. 157.

Their troops outnumbered ours more than two to one, and fought with considerable dash.

N. A. Rev., CXLIH. 46.

6. A flourish; an ostentatious parade.

She was a first-rate ship, the old Victor was, though I suppose she wouldn't cut much of a dash now 'longside of some of the new clippers. E. O. Jewett, Deephaven, p. 184.

7. (a) In writing and printing, a horizontal stroke or line of varying length, used as a mark of punctuation and for other purposes; specifically, in printing, a type the face of which consists of such a line. The dashes regularly furnished in a font of type are called respectively the one dash (—), a square of the size of the font, the en dash (—), half a square, the two-en dash (—), two squares, and the three-en dash (—), three squares. In punctuation, the en dash is used to note a sudden transition or break of continuity in a sentence, more marked than that indicated by a comma, and also at the beginning and end of a parenthetical clause—properly of one more directly related to the general sense than a true parenthesis. (See parenthesis.) The en or the en dash is often used to indicate the omission of the intermediate terms of a series which are to be supplied in reading, being thus often equivalent to "to . . . inclusive": thus, Mark iv. 30, or 3-30 (that is, verses 3 to 30, inclusive), the years 1880-88 (that is, 1880 to 1888). As a mark of hiatus or suppression, the dash—usually one of the longer ones—stands for something omitted, as a name or part of a name, the concluding words of an unfinished sentence, or the connecting words of a series of broken sentences. Various other more or less arbitrary uses are made of dashes, as in place of de (de), to indicate repetition of names in a catalogue or the like, as a dividing line between sections, articles, or other portions of matter, etc.

Observe well the dash too, at the end of this Name.
Wycherley, Plain Dealer, v. 1.

(b) In printing, also, a line (variously modified in form) used for the separation of distinct portions of matter, as the parallel dash (—), the double dash (—), the diamond or swell dash (—), etc. (c) Any short mark or line.

—8. In music: (a) The short stroke placed over or under a note by which a staccato effect is indicated. See staccato. (b) The line or stroke drawn through a figure in thorough-bass which indicates that the tone signified by the figure is to be chromatically raised a semitone. (c) In harpsichord-music, a coulé (which see).—9. In soil, a longitudinal mark, generally rounded and clearly defined at one end, and tapering or gradually becoming indistinct at the other, as if produced by a drop of colored liquid dashed obliquely against the surface, or by the rough stroke of a pen. Such marks are very common on the wings of the Lepidoptera.—10. A present made by a trader to a chief on the western coast of Africa to secure permission to traffic with the natives.

—11. Same as dash-board.—12. In sporting, a short race decided in one attempt, not in heats: as, a hundred-yard dash.—To cut a dash, see cut, a dash-board (dash-bôrd), n. 1. A board or leathern apron placed on the fore part of a chaise, gig, or other vehicle, to prevent water, mud, etc., from being thrown upon those in the vehicle by the heels of the horses.—2. The float of a paddle-wheel.—3. A screen placed at the bow of a steam-launch to throw off the spray; a spray-board.

dashed (dash't), a. [< dash + -ed]. 1. Composed of, inclosed by, or abounding with dashes: as, a dashed line; a dashed clause; a dashed poem.—2. Abashed; confused. See dash, v., 8.

Before her you looked dashed, and kept bowing to the ground, and talked, for all the world, as if you were before a justice of peace. Goldsmith, The Stoops to Conquer, III.

3. A euphemism for darned, from the form d—d, often used to represent that word.

dasher (dash'er), n. 1. One who or that which dashes or agitates, as the float of a paddle-wheel, the plunger of a churn, and the like.—2. A dash-board.—3. One who makes an ostentatious parade; a bold, showy, ostentatious man or woman. [Colloq.]

She was astonished to find in high life a degree of vulgarity of which her country companions would have been ashamed, but all such things in high life go under the general term dashing. These young ladies were dashers. Alas! perhaps foreigners and future generations may not know the meaning of the term.

Mrs Edgeworth, Almeria, p. 292.

Dashers' who once on month assemble,
Make creditors and coachmen tremble,
And dress'd in colours vastly fine,
Drive to some public-house to dine.
W. Cowley, Dr. Syntax's Tours, i. 14.

d, Dasher block

dash-guard (dash'gård), n. A metal plate which protects the platform of a street-car from the mud or snow which might be thrown upon it by the horses.

dashing (dash'ing), p. a. [pp. of dash, v.] 1. Performed with or at a dash; impetuous; spirited: as, a dashing charge.

On the 4th Van Dorn made a dashing attack, hoping, no doubt, to capture Rosecrans before his reinforcements could come up. U. S. Grant, Personal Memoirs, I. 416.

This dastard, at the battle of Falay, . . . Before we met, or that a stroke was given, Like to a trusty squire did run away.

Shak., I Hen. VI., iv. 1.

But ill the dastard kept his oath, Whose cowardice hath undone us both.

Scott, Marmion, II. 92.

= Sw. 2. Poltroon, Crawn, etc. See coward.

3. a. Characterized by base cowardice; meanly shrinking from danger, or from the consequences of malicious acts.

Curse on their dastard souls!

At this paltry price did the dastard prince consent to stay his arm at the only moment when it could be used effectively for his country. Precut, Ferd. and Is., I. 13.

dastard (das'tård), v. t. [< dastard, n.] 1. To make dastard; intimidate; dispirit.

There is another man within me, that's angry with me, rebukes, commands, and dastards me.

Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, II. 7.

Dastards manly souls with hope and fear.

Dryden, Indian Emperor, II. 2.

2. To call one dastard or coward. [Rare in both uses.]

dastardice (das'tård-iz), n. [< dastard + -ice, after cowardice.] Cowardice; dastardliness.

I was upbraided with ingratitude, dastardice, and all my difficulties with my angel charged upon myself, for want of following my blows.

Richardson, Clarissa Harlowe, vi. 49.

dastardise (das'tård-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. dastardised, pp. dastardising. [< dastard + -ise.] To make dastard; cow. [Rare.]

I believe it is not in the Power of Flouden to dastardise or cow your Spirits until you have overcome him.

Howell, Letters, I. 1. 9.

For if he liv'd, and we were conquerors, He had such things to urge against our marriage As, now declar'd, would blunt my sword in battle, And dastardise my courage.

Dryden, Don Sebastian, II. 2.

dastardliness (das'tård-li-nes), n. Cowardice.

dastardly (das'tård-li), a. Characterized by gross cowardice; meanly timid; base; sneaking.

Brawl and clamour is so arrant a mark of a dastardly wretch that he does as good as call himself so that uses it.

Sir R. L. Estlin.

If Dryden is never dastardly, as Pope often was, so also he never wrote anything so maliciously depreciatory as Pope's unprovoked attack on Addison.

Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 70.

dastardness (das'tård-nen), n. The character of a dastard; base timidity. [Rare.]

dastardy (das'tård-di), n. [< dastard + -y.] Dastardliness; base cowardice. [Rare.]

dasturi (das-tü'ri), n. [< Hind. dastür, perquisites, commission, < dastür, custom, usage, customary fee, < Pers. dastür, a custom.] The commission, gratuity, or bribe surreptitiously paid by native dealers and others in India to agents, servants, and employees, in order to secure the custom of their masters. Also spelled dastoor.

No doubt presents were received from native contractors, and dastoor or commission from native dealers and manufacturers. J. T. Wheeler, Short Hist. India, p. 527.

dass, v. See dase.

Dasya (das'i-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. dæos, thick, dense, shaggy, hairy, rough, = L. densus, thick; see dense.] A genus of marine algae, belonging to the order Floridæ. The fronds are bright-red, filiform or compressed, branching, and polypinnate. The genus is especially characterized by the monostichous filaments which clothe the frond or its upper parts, and in which the tetrasporous are borne in regular rows. There are about 70 species, mostly tropical, many occurring on the coast of Australia. Dasya sylvana is a beautiful species, common in the United States, from Cape Cod southward, and in the Adriatic sea; it is called chondria.

dasyberd, n. See dashberd.

Dasygaster (das-i-gas'trë), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. dæos, shaggy, hairy, + gaster, belly.] In Latreille's system of classification, a group of Apidae or bees, having the under side of the abdomen of the female hairy, as in the genera Megachile, Anthidium, etc. The mason-bees and leaf-cutter bees belong to this group. Also written Dasygaster, Dasygastria.

Dasythron (das-i-thrön), n. [NL., < Gr. dæos, thick, dense, + thron, a lily.] The plants are lily-like, with numerous crowded leaves.] A liliaceous genus of Mexico and adjacent parts of the United States, allied to Tacca, with a dense rosette of rigid, linear, often spinously toothed leaves, and a tall stem bearing a panicle of small white flowers. There are nearly 20 species, some of which are occasionally cultivated for ornament.

dasymer (da-sim'e-ter), n. [< Gr. dæos, thick, dense, + μετρον, measure.] An instrument designed for testing the density of gases. See manometer.

Dasyornis (das-i-ör'nis), n. [NL. (Vigors and Horsfield, 1826), < Gr. dæos, shaggy, hairy, + ornis, a bird.] A genus of dextrostral oscine passerine birds of the malurine group, inhabiting Australia, New Zealand, Africa, etc. The species composing the genus as originally proposed are now distributed in the genera Sphenurus and Aquaricus (or Sphenurus).

Dasypterus (das-i-ptë's), n. [NL., < Gr. dæos, rough, hairy, + πτερος, pl. pteris, child.] Coined by Sundevall in 1873 as an alternative to Phlopterus, this being liable to confusion with Pteropterus.] Same as Phlopterus.

dasyptid (das-i-ptë'dik), a. [As Dasypterus + -ic.] Same as phloptid.

Dasyptilids (das-i-ptë'ti-dë), n. pl. [NL., < Dasyptilis + -idae.] The Dasyptilinae regarded as a separate family: same as Rhachiodontidae.

Dasyptilinae (das-i-ptë'ti-në), n. pl. [NL., < Dasyptilis + -inae.] A subfamily of Colubridæ, typified by the genus Dasyptilis, having the body slender, the maxillary teeth few and rudimentary, and the hypapophyses of several vertebrae piercing the throat and capped with enamel, thus forming a series of esophageal teeth. From this remarkable structure the group is also called Rhachiodontidae, after the genus Rhachodon, one of the several synonyms of Dasyptilis. Besides Dasyptilis, the subfamily includes the genus Elachistodon.

Dasyptilis (das-i-ptë'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. dæos, thick, dense, + πτερος, a light shield.] The typical genus of the family Dasyptilidae. D. scabra is an African species. Also Anodon, Diodon, and Rhachodon (which see).

dasyphyllous (das-i-fil'us), a. [< Gr. dæos, hairy, + φυλλον = L. folium, leaf.] In bot., having woolly or hairy leaves.

Dasyptis (da-sip'i-dë), n. pl. [NL.] Same as Dasyptilidae.

dasyptode (das-i-pöd), n. [< Dasyptus (Dasyptis), see Dasyptis.] An animal of the family Dasyptilidae; an armadillo. Also dasyptide.

dasyptoid (da-sip'ö'id), n. An edentate of the family Dasyptilidae.

Dasyptodidae (das-i-pöd-i-dë), n. pl. [NL., < Dasyptus (-pod) + -idae.] A South American family of loricate edentate quadrupeds; the armadillos. It was formerly continuous with the suborder Loricata of Edentata; it is now, by the exclusion of Tatusiidae and Chlamyphoridae, restricted to the typical armadillos, having the fore toes variously modified and disproportionate in length to one another, the second being the longest, the third, fourth, and fifth variously shortened; the head broad behind; and the ears far apart. There are four subfamilies: Dasyptodinae (the encouberts), Xenerinae (the kabamons), Prionodontinae (the kabalasas), and Tolypeutinae (the apars). Also Dasyptidae.

Dasyptodinae (das-i-pöd-i-në), n. pl. [NL., < Dasyptus (-pod) + -inae.] The typical subfamily of the Dasyptodidae, containing the encoubert, peludo, etc. They have the anterior and posterior divisions of the carapace well marked: the tail with a conical sheath; the teeth moderate in number (9 or 10 on each side above and below); and the first to the third metacarpal regularly graduated in length, the third being the longest, and the fourth and fifth much shortened. The genera are Dasyptus and Euphractus. See cuts under aper and armadillo.

dasyptodine (da-sip'ö-din), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Dasyptodinae.

II. n. One of the Dasyptodinae, as the peludo, Dasyptus villosus.

Dasyprocta (das-i-prok'tä), n. [NL., < Gr. dæos, hairy, with hairy buttocks, < dæos, hairy, + πρωκτος, the buttocks.] The typical genus of the family Dasyproctidae. It includes the whole of the family except the pacas, and is characterized by having only 3 developed toes on the hind feet. It comprehends all the agoutis and the acouchis, as the yellow-rumped agouti (D. agouti), Amazon agouti (D. azarae), and the acouchi (D. acouchi). D. acouchi inhabits some of the West Indies as well as South America; the other species of the genus are confined to South America. See cuts under agouti and agouti.

dasyproctid (das-i-prok'tid), n. A rodent of the family Dasyproctidae.

Dasyproctidae (das-i-prok'ti-dë), n. pl. [NL., < Dasyprocta + -idae.] A family of simioid rodents, of the hystricine series, consisting of the two genera Calogeomys and Dasyprocta, the former of which contains the paca alone (C. paca), the latter the agoutia. The nails of the feet are hoof-like; the fore feet are 5-toed; the hind feet have also 5 toes (paca), or only 3 (agoutia); the tail is rudimentary or very short; the ears are low; and the upper lip is not cleft. Contrary to the rule in the hystricid series of rodents, the clavicles are rudimentary; and the molar teeth are semi-rooted, and the incisors long. The Dasyproctidae are related to the cavies and chinchillas (see cavy and chinchilla); they are confined to the Neotropical region, inhabiting parts of Mexico, some of the West Indies, and the greater part of South America, especially wooded and watered localities. See cavy under agouti and Chinchilla.

Dasypros (das-i-pus), n. [NL., < Gr. dasypros, hairy- or rough-footed; used only as a noun, a hare, rabbit; < dasy, hairy, rough, + pros (rod-) = E. foot.] A genus of armadillos, formerly conterminous with the family Dasyproctidae, now restricted to certain species of the subfamily Dasyproctina (which see). See also cavy under armadillo.

Dasyrhamphus (das-i-ram'fus), n. [NL. (Hombert and Jacquinot, 1846), < Gr. dasyr, shaggy, hairy, + rhamphos, beak, snout.] A genus of penguins, of the family Spheniscidae: so called from having the bill extensively feathered. The only species is D. adelia, of the antarctic seas.

dasytes (das-i-tēs), n. [NL., < Gr. dasytes, hairiness, roughness, < dasy, hairy, rough: see Dasya.] 1. In soil, hairiness; hirsuteness; a growth of hair on some part not usually hairy. — 2. [cop.] In entom., a genus of beetles, of the family Clorida.

dasyure (das-i-ūr), n. [< Dasyurus.] An animal of the subfamily Dasyurinae. — Thylacine dasyure. See Thylacine and Thylacine, n. — Ursine dasyure, the Tasmanian devil. See Sarcophilus.

Dasyuridae (das-i-ūr-i-dē), pl. [NL., < Dasyurus + -idae.] A family of polyprotodont marsupial mammals. They have 4 incisors in each half of the upper and 3 in each half of the lower jaw; the canines well developed; the hind feet with the clawless hallux small and rudimentary, rarely apposeable; the limbs of proportionate length; the stomach simple; and no coccyx. They are predatory carnivorous or insectivorous marsupials of Australia, Tasmania, New Guinea, and some other islands. They are divided into the two subfamilies Dasyurinae and Myrmecobinae. These animals are sometimes known indiscriminately as brush-tailed opossums.

Dasyurinae (das-i-ūr-i-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Dasyurus + -inae.] A subfamily of Dasyuridae; the dasyurines. The tongue is not specially extensible, and the premaxilla and molars are not more than 7 in number; in these respects the subfamily is contrasted with Myrmecobinae (which see). The leading genera are Dasyurus, Sarcophilus, and Thylacine, or the true, the urine, and the thylacine dasyurines, and Phascogale; the last is properly made the type of a different subfamily, Phascogalinae.

dasyurine (das-i-ūr'in), a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Dasyurinae or Dasyuridae.

Dasyurus (das-i-ūr'us), n. [NL., < Gr. dasy, hairy, rough, + ūr, tail.] The typical genus of the subfamily Dasyurinae, formerly coextensive with the subfamily, now restricted by the exclusion of Thylacine and Sarcophilus. The true dasyurines of the restricted genus mostly inhabit Australia and Tasmania, where they replace the smaller pred-a datary (see def.), lit. a dater (so called because he dates and despatches official documents), prop. adj., relating to dates, < data, datum, a date: see date<sup>1</sup>, n.] An officer of the chancery at Rome, who directly represents the pope in all matters relating to grants, dispensations, etc. All petitions pass through his hands; he has the right of granting benefices not exceeding an annual value of 54 denarii; and with him solely rests the duty of registering and dating all bulls and other documents issued from the Vatican. He is generally a bishop, and is assisted by a subdatary, who is also in holy orders. When a cardinal is elected to the office of datary he bears the title of prædatory. See datary<sup>2</sup>.

datary<sup>2</sup> (dā'tā-rī), n. [= F. datarie = Sp. dataria = It. dataria = Lt. dataria, < ML. dataria, the office or business of a datary, prop. fem. of adj. datarius: see datary<sup>1</sup>.] The office or duty of dating and despatching papal documents; specifically, a branch of the Curia at Rome, established about the end of the thirteenth century by Pope Boniface VIII., for the purpose of dating, registering, and despatching all bulls and documents issued by the pope, examining and reporting upon petitions, etc., and granting favors and dispensations under certain conditions and limitations. See datary<sup>1</sup>.

For riches, besides the temporal dominions, he [Plus V.] hath in all the countries before-named the datary or dispatching of Bulls. Howell, Letters, l. i. 38.

That part of a writing or an inscription which purports to specify the time when, and usually the place where, it was executed. A full date includes the place, day, month, and year; but in some cases the date may consist of only one or two of these particulars, as the year on a coin. In letters the date is inserted to indicate the time when they are written or sent. In deeds, contracts, wills, and other papers, to indicate the time of execution, and usually the time from which they are to take effect on the rights of the parties; but the written date does not exclude evidence of the real time of execution or delivery, and consequent taking effect. In documents the date is usually placed at the end, but may be at the beginning, as it is now generally in letters.

This Deed may bear an older Date than what you have obtain'd from your Lady. Congreve, Way of the World, v. 12.

2. The time, with more or less particularity, when some event has happened or is to happen: as, the date of a battle; the dates of birth and death on a monument; the date of Easter varies from year to year, or is variable. — 3. Point or period of time in general: as, at that early date. — 4. A season or allotted period of time.

Then ever shall, while dates of times remain,
The heavens thy soul, the earth thy fame contain. Ford, Fame's Memorial.

Your Date of Deliberation, Madam, is expired. Congreve, Way of the World, v. 10.

When your date is over, Peacefully ye fade. R. T. Cook, Daisies.

5. Age; number of years.

Doubled her own, for want of playmates, he . . .
Had lost his ball, and frown his kite, and roll'd His hoop to pleasure Edith. Tennyson, Aylmer's Field.

6. Duration; continuance.

Ages of endless date. Milton, P. L., xii. 549
We say that Learning's endless, and blame Fate
For not allowing Life a longer Date. Cowley, Death of Sir Henry Wootton.

7. End; conclusion. [Rare.]

"Why stands ye yel?" he sayde to thos,

Alberic's Poems (E. E. T. S.), i. 515
Yet hath the longest day his date.
Turning of a Shrove (Child's Ballads, VIII. 185)

What time would spare, from steel receives its date.
Pope, R. of the L., III. 171.

8. A day-book, journal, or diary. Minshew. — Date certifies, in French law, the date fixed when the instrument has been subjected to the formality of registration, after which the parties to the deed cannot by mutual consent change the date. — Down to date, up to date, to the present time.

So of Solomon in reference to Bahobam, and of every father in reference to every son, up to date. W. M. Baker, New Timothy, p. 128.

Out of date, no longer in use or in vogue; obsolete; out of season; old-fashioned.

In Parliament his [Burke's] eloquence was out of date. A young generation, which knew him not, had filled the House. Macaulay, Warren Hastings.

No flower girls in the market,
For flowers are out of date. R. H. Stoddard, Persian Songs.

To bear date. See bear. — To make dates, to make appointments. (a) For the performance of a theatrical company. (b) For secret meetings, especially for an immoral purpose; make assignments.

They say that women and music should never be dated. Goldsmith, She Stoops to Conquer, III.

A letter was received from him . . . dated at a small Dutch village on the banks of the Hudson. Irving, Knickerbocker, p. 22.

2. To note or fix the time of, as of an event or transaction; assign a date or time of occurrence to: as, to date an event in ancient history.

I date from this era the corrupt method of education among us. Swift, Modern Education.

3. To have a date: as, the letter dates from Rome. See I., 1.— 2. To have beginning; derive origin.

The Batavian republic dates from the successes of the French arms. E. Everett.

3. To use a date in reckoning; reckon from some point in time.

We . . . date from the late era of about six thousand years. Bentley.

da teatro (dā tā-tē'ō), [It.: da, < L. de, of; teatro, < L. theatrum, theater.] In music, a direction signifying that a piece is to be played or performed in a theatrical style.

dateless (dāt'les), a. [< date<sup>1</sup> + -less.] 1. Having no date; bearing nothing to indicate its date. — 2. Not distinguishable or divisible by dates; without incident; eventless.

Then can I drown an eye, unused to flow,
For precious friends hid in death's dateless night. Shak., Sonnets, xxx.

To divide our otherwise dateless, monotonous, stale life into refreshing changes of chapters, paragraphs, verses, and clauses. Beaumont, Creative Week, p. 148.

3. So old or far distant in time as to be undatable; of indefinitely long duration.

In the primeval age a dateless while The vacant shepherd wander'd with his flock. Coleridge, Religious Musings.

The dateless hills, which it needed earthquakes to lift and deluges to mould. Ruskin.

date-line (dāt'lin), n. The boundary-line between neighboring regions where the calendar day is different. This line runs through the Pacific ocean, and is supposed to coincide with the meridian of 12 hours or 180° from Greenwich; but it practically follows a somewhat devious course, and is sometimes confused. Thus the Sundays of the Russian and of the American settlers in Alaska formerly fell upon different days. On the east of the date-line the nominal date is one day earlier than on the west of it; so that the American Sunday in Alaska coincides with the former Russian Monday.

date-mark (dāt'mārk), n. A special mark stamped on an article of gold or silver to indicate the year of manufacture. Thus, in the London Goldsmiths' Company, during the twenty years from 1866 to 1875 this mark was a letter of the alphabet in small Old English character, for the next twenty years, beginning in 1876 and ending in 1895, Roman capitals were adopted.

date-palm (dāt'pām'), n. The common name of Phoenix dactylifera, the palm-tree of Scripture; also called date-tree. Next to the coconut tree, the date is unquestionably the most interesting and useful of the palm tribe. As with the coconut tree, nearly every part is applied to some useful purpose, and the fruit not only affords the principal food of the inhabitants of various countries, but is a source of a large part of their traffic. It is cultivated in immense numbers all over the northern part of Africa as well as in southern Asia, and is found throughout southern Europe, though rarely productive there. Its stem shoots up to the height of from 60 to 80 feet with outbranching divisions, and is of nearly the same thickness throughout its length. From the summit it throws out a magnificent crown of large feathery leaves, and a number of spadices, each of which in the female plant bears a bunch of from 150 to 200 dates, each bunch weighing from 20 to 35 pounds. The fruit is eaten fresh or dried. The best dates of commerce are obtained from the coasts of the Persian gulf, where the tree is cultivated with great care, and where over 100 varieties are known. The date-palm was probably originally derived from the wild date-palm, P. sylvestris, which is found throughout India, and is planted very extensively in Bengal, chiefly for the production of toddy and sugar. See Phoenix.

Europe, where it is used as a substitute for Persian bark, as a yellow dye, and in the manufacture of cordage.

Datiscaceae (dā-tis'hā-sē-sē), n. pl. [NL., < Datiscia + -aceae.] A small natural order of plants, with apetalous flowers, but having closer affinities with the Cucurbitaceae and Begoniaceae than with any of the apetalous orders, and united by Baillon with the Sauvagineae. There are only three genera, of which Datiscia is the best-known.

datiscin (dā-tis'in), n. [Datiscia + -in.] A substance (C<sub>21</sub>H<sub>32</sub>O<sub>10</sub>) having the appearance of grape-sugar, first extracted by Brasconnet from the leaves of Datiscia cannabina. It has been used as a yellow dye.

datist (dā-tis't), n. The mnemonic name given by Petrus Hispanus to that mood of the third figure of syllogism in which the major premise is universal and affirmative, and the minor premise and conclusion are particular and affirmative. These distinctions of quantity and quality are indicated by the vowels of the word, a i i. The letter s after the second vowel shows that the mood is reduced to direct reasoning by the simple conversion of the minor, and the initial d shows that the resulting mood is darit. The following is an example of a syllogism in datist: All men irrationally prejudiced have weak minds; but some men irrationally prejudiced are learned; hence, some learned men have weak minds.

dativ (dā'tiv), a. and n. [= F. datif = Pr. datiu = Sp. Pg. It. dativo = D. datief = G. Dan. dawsonite (dā'son-īt), n. [After J. W. Dawson of Montreal (born 1830).] A hydrous carbonate of sodium and aluminium, occurring in white-bladed crystals at Montreal, and in the province of Blans in Italy.

dawt, daut (dāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. dawted or dawt, ppr. dawting. [So.; hardly the same as daw, q. v.] To regard or treat with affection; pet; caress; fondle.

I'll set thee on a chair of gold,
And daut thee kindly on my knee.
Lord James Douglas (Child's Ballad, IV. 130).

Much dawted by the gods is he,
Who to the Indian plain Successor's ploughs the wally sea,
And safe returns again.
Lansing, The Foot's Wish.

dawtle, dawty (dā'ti), n. [So., dim. from dawt.] A beloved child; a darling; a child much fondled through affection: frequently used as a term of endearment.

It's ten to one ye're aae their dawty.
Sherrif, Foema, p. 382.

day (dā), n. [Early mod. E. also days, date; < M.E. day, dai, del, dage, dawe, dage, etc., < A.S. dag, pl. dagas, = OS. dag = OFries. dei, di = MLG. dach, LG. dag = D. dag = OHG. tag, MHG. tag, G. tag = leel. dagr = Sw. Dan. dag = Goth. dags, day; akin to A.S. (post.) dāgor = leel. dōgr, day. Possibly ult. < *Ind.-Eur. √ *dhagh, Skt. √ dah, burn*. Not connected with L. dies, day (see dial). Hence daw and dawn.] 1. The period during which the sun is above the horizon, or shines continuously on any given portion of the earth's surface; the interval of light, in contradistinction to that of darkness, or to night; the period between the rising and the setting of the sun, of varying length, and called by astronomers the artificial day.

And God called the light Day, and the darkness he called Night.
Gen. i. 5.

And always, night and day, he was in the mountains.
Mark v. 5.

It was the middle of the day.
Ever the weary wind went on.
Tennyson, Dying Swan.

Hence—2. Light; sunshine.

Let us walk honestly, as in the day.
Rom. xiii. 13.

It is directly in your way, we have day enough to perform our journey, and, as you like your entertainment, you may there repose yourself a day or two.

Cotton, in Walton's Angler, ii. 235.

While the day,
Descending, struck athwart the hall, and shot
A flying splendour out of brass and steel.
Tennyson, Princess, vi.

3. The whole time or period of one revolution of the earth on its axis, or the space of twenty-four hours; specifically, the interval of time which elapses between two consecutive returns of the same terrestrial meridian to the sun. In this latter specific sense it is called the natural, solar, or astronomical day. Since the length of this day is continually varying, owing to the eccentricity of the earth's orbit and the obliquity of the ecliptic, a mean solar day (the civil day) is employed, which is the average period of one revolution of the earth on its axis relative to the sun's position considered as fixed. The day of twenty-four hours may be reckoned from noon to noon, as in the astronomical or nautical day, or from midnight to midnight, as in the civil day recognized in the United States, throughout the British empire, and in most of the countries of Europe. The Babylonians reckoned the civil day from sunrise to sunrise; the Umbrians, from noon to noon; the Athenians and Hebrews, from sunset to sunset; and the Romans, from midnight to midnight.

And the evening and the morning were the first day.
Gen. i. 5.

My lord, I cannot be so soon provided;
Please you, deliberate a day or two.
Shak., T. G. of V., i. 2.

4. A particular or regularly recurring period of twenty-four hours, assigned to the doing of some specified thing, or connected with some event or observance: as, settling-day; bill-day.

Knip's maid comes to me, to tell me that the women's day at the playhouse is to-day, and that therefore I must be there, to encrease their profit.
Pope, Diary, IV. 29. Specifically—(a) An anniversary; the particular day on which some event is commemorated: as, St. Bartholomew's day; a birthday; New Year's day. (b) The regularly recurring period in each week set apart for some particular purpose, as for receiving calls, etc.

Mr. Gayman, your servant; you'll be at my Aunt Susan's this afternoon; 'tis her day, you know.
Southern, Maid's Last Prayer, i.

You have been at my Lady Whiff's upon her day, Madam?

Ladies, however, have their days, and afternoon tea is as much an institution in Australia as at home.
Arch. Forbes, Souvenirs of some Continents, p. 75.

5. Time. (a) Specified interval or space of time: as, three years' day to do something; he was absent for a year's day. (b) Time to pay; credit. [Time is now used in this sense.]

Faith, then, I'll pray you, 'cause he is my neighbour,
To take a hundred pound, and give him day.
B. Jonson, Tale of a Tub, iv. 1.

(c) Period of time.

At twenty-one, in a day of gloom and terror, he was placed at the head of the administration.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vii.

(d) Appointed time; set period; appointment.

After long waiting, & large expenses, though he kept not day with them, yet he came at length & took them in, in y<sup>e</sup> night.
Burdord, Flymouth Plantation, p. 12.

If my debtors do not keep their day.
Dryden.

(e) Definite time of existence, activity, or influence; allotted or actual term of life, usefulness, or glory: as, his day is over.

The cat will mew, and dog will have his day.

Shak., Hamlet, v. 1.

Lady Snore. Why, truly, Mrs. Clackitt has a very pretty talent, and a great deal of industry.

Snare. True, nadam, and has been tolerably successful in her day.
Sherriden, School for Scandal, I. 1.

Our little systems have their day:

They have their day and cease to be.

Tennyson, In Memoriam, Prol.

(f) A time or period, as distinguished from other times or periods; ago: commonly used in the plural: as, bygone days; the days of our fathers.

Much cruelty did the Patavines suffer in this mans dates.
Coryat, Crudities, I. 158.

dazle (dā'zī), v.; pret. and pp. dassied, ppr. dassing. [Freq. of daze.] I. trans. 1. To overpower with light; hinder distinct vision of by intense light; dim, as the sight, by excess of light.

Dark with excessive bright thy shirs appear,

Yet dazle heaven; thy brightest sunshin

Approach not, but with both winks veil thy eyes.

Milton, P. L., III, 351.

Then did the glorious light of the Gospel shine forth, and dazle the eyes even of those who were thought to see best and furthest.

Sp. Atterbury, Sermons, I, III.

2. Figuratively, to overpower or confound by splendor or brilliancy, or with show or display of any kind.

His sparkling eyes, replete with wrathful fire,
More dazled and drove back his enemies
Than mid-day sun, fierce bent against their faces.

Shak., 1 Hen. VI, l. 1.

II. intr. 1. To be stupefied; be mentally confused.

Sure, I dazle.

There cannot be a faith in that foul woman,
That knows no god more mighty than her mischief.

Beau. and Fl., Maid's Tragedy, iv, 1.

2. To be overpowered by light; become unsteady or waver, as the sight.

I dare not trust these eyes;
They dance in mist, and dazzle with surprise.

Dryden.

3. To be overpoweringly or blindingly bright.

—4. Figuratively, to excite admiration by brilliancy or showy qualities which overbear criticism.

Ah, friend! to dazle let the vain design.

Pope, Moral Essays, II, 242.

dazle (dā'zī), n. [< dazle, v.] 1. Brightness; splendor; excess of light.

The arena swam in a dazle of light.

L. Wallace, Ben-Hur, p. 259.

2. Meretricious display; brilliancy. Moore.

dazzlement (dā'zī-ment), n. [< dazle + -ment.] 1. The act or power of dazzling; dazzling effect.

It beat back the sight with a dazzlement.

Donne, Hist. Septuagint, p. 55.

2. That which dazzles.

Many holes, drilled in the conical turret-roof of this vagabond Pharos (a hand-lantern), let up spots of dazzlement into the bearer's eyes . . . as he paced forth in the ghostly darkness.

R. L. Stevenson, A Plea for Gas Lamp.

dazzler (dā'zī-ler), n. One who or that which dazzles; specifically, one who produces an effect by gaudy or meretricious display. [Chiefly colloq.]

Mr. Lumby shook his head with great solemnity, as though to imply that he supposed she must have been rather a dazzler.

DeVries, Nicholas Nickleby, xxxvi.

dazzlingly (dā'zī-ling-lī), adv. In a dazzling or blinding manner; confusingly; astonishingly.

Pompey's success had been dazzlingly rapid.

Frederic, Cesar, p. 181.

dbk. In com., a common contraction for drew-back.

D-block (dē'blok), n. [< D (from the shape) + block.] A block formerly bolted to a ship's side in the channels, and through which the lifts were rove.

D. C. In music, an abbreviation of da capo.

D. O. L. An abbreviation of Latin doctor civilitatis legis, Doctor of Civil Law.

D. D. An abbreviation of Latin (ML.) divinitatis doctor, Doctor of Divinity.

d/d. An abbreviation of days' date (days after date) used in commercial writings: as, to make out a bill payable 30 d/d (30 days after date).

D. D. S. An abbreviation of Doctor of Dental Surgery, a degree conferred upon the graduates of a dental college.

de (dē), n. [Also written dee, < ME. de, < AS. de, < L. de, the name of the fourth letter, < d, its proper sound, + -e, a vowel used with consonants to assist their utterance.] The fourth letter of the Latin and English alphabets. It is rarely spelled out, being usually represented by the simple character. See D, 1.

de, prep. [(1) ME. de, < OF. de, F. de = Sp. Pg. de = It. di, < L. de, from, of, etc.: see de.] (2) < L. de: see de.] 1. A French preposition, found in English only in some French phrases, as couleur de rose, or in proper names, as in Simon de Montfort, Cœur de Lion, De Vere, etc., either of Middle English origin, or modern and mere French.

Its use in such names, following the name proper, and preceding what was originally, in most cases, the name of an estate, led to its acceptance as evidence of noble or gentle descent, corresponding in this to the German von and the Dutch van. But as the particle in proper names often originated without any such implication, and has also been often assumed without authority, it is in itself of no value as such evidence.

2. A Latin preposition, meaning 'from' or 'of,' occurring in certain phrases often used in English: as, de novo, anew; de facto, of fact; de jure, of right.

de- [(1) ME. de, < OF. de, often written des, def, F. de, de- = Sp. Pg. de = It. di, < L. de, prefix, de, prep., from, away from, down from, out of, of, etc. (2) ME. de, de-, < OF. de-, de-, mod. F. de-, < L. de-, dis-: see de-, dif-. 1. A verb-prefix of Latin origin, expressing in Latin, and hence with modifications in modern speech, various phases of the original meaning 'from, away from, down from.' (1) Separative, denoting departure or removal—'off, from off, away, down, out, or cessation or removal of the fundamental idea of privative, equivalent to ex or dis or privative. (2) 'Complete'—'through out to the end,' etc. (3) Intensive: a force often lost in English. (See examples following.) In some words the separative or privative force of this prefix is felt in English, as in decompose, demote, being in such meaning often used as an English prefix (de- privative), as in deconstruct, deconstructive, deconstruct, etc. It is less distinctly felt in words like depress, devalue, etc.; and in many words, where it has in Latin the complete or intensive force, its force is not felt in English, as in deride, denote, etc.

2. In some words a reduced form of the original Latin prefix dis-, Latin dis- and dis- being in Old French and Middle English more or less merged in form and meaning (see dis-). See defer, deface, defame, decoy, etc.

de- A form of -di-, -di-, or -di-, -di- in older English, as in solde, felde, etc., now extant only in made, the (contracted) preterit and past participle of make. See -di-, -di-.

deab. A kind of dog, the ekia (which see). deacidification (dē'a-sid'i-f-kā'shon), n. [de- priv. + acidification.] The removal or neutralization of an acid or of acidity.

deacon (dē'kn), n. [Early mod. E. also deken; < ME. deken, dekin, decon, deacon, diakon, deakne, < AS. deodan, deodan = D. deken, diakon = MLG. diakon = G. diakon, diakon = Icel. diakon, diakon, < Dan. degn, a parish clerk, = Sw. degn, a scholar (Dan. Sw. diakon, deacon), = OF. diacne, diacne, F. diacre = Pr. diacre, diague = Sp. diacno = Pg. diacno, < LL. diaconus = Goth. diakon, a deacon, < Gr. diakonos, a servant, waitingman, messenger, eccles. a deacon; of uncertain origin; perhaps related to deceus, pursue, cause to run. The Teut. forms appear to have been in part confused with the forms belonging to L. decanus, a dean (see dean), and with those belonging to G. degen, etc., AS. degn, E. thane (see thane).] 1. Eccles., one of a body of men, either forming an order of the ministry or serving merely as elected officers of individual churches, whose chief duty is to assist a presbyter, priest, or other clergyman, especially in administering the eucharist and in the care of the poor. (a) In the apostolic church, one of an order of ministers or church-officers, inferior to apostles and presbyters, whose duty it was to serve at the Lord's Supper, or as a deacon to minister to the poor. It is generally believed that the institution of this office is recorded in Acts vi. 1-6, where, although the word deacon (diakonos, minister) is not used of the seven persons appointed, the corresponding words "to minister or serve" (diakonein) and "ministration" (diakonia) are employed. By an analogy with the Mosaic hierarchy, St. Clement of Rome in the apostolic age called the deacons Levites, and this use of the word Levite long remained frequent. (b) In the early Christian church, one of the third order of the ministry, of lower rank than bishops and presbyters. The deacons applied complete unction to men in preparation for baptism, but anointed women on the forehead only, assisted the celebrant at the eucharist, read the gospel and made proclamations during the liturgy, maintained order in the congregation, and cared for the poor and sick. Those attached to episcopal sees acted as the bishop's assistants, messengers, and representatives, and when belonging to a great patriarchal or metropolitan see possessed much influence. Hence—(c) In the Greek Church, one of the third order of the ministry, similar in rank and duties to the officer of the same name in the early church. (d) In the Roman Catholic Church, a member of the third order of the ministry. He assists the priest throughout the celebration of the eucharist or mass, and reads the gospel. The principal assistant to the celebrant at a solemn celebration is called the deacon, and vested accordingly, whether in deacon's, priest's, or bishop's orders. (e) In the Anglican Church, a member of the third order of the ministry. His duties are to assist the priest in divine service, especially at the holy communion, help in distributing the elements to the people, read the Scriptures, especially the eucharistic gospel, catechize, baptize infants in the absence of the priest, preach if licensed by the bishop, and seek out the sick and poor and make their wants known to the curate. Deacons cannot consecrate the eucharist, pronounce absolution, or give benediction. The bishop, priest, or deacon who acts as principal assistant at the holy communion is called the deacon or gospel. (f) In the Methodist Episcopal Church, a member of an order of the ministry next below that of elder. The deacons are elected by the annual conference, are ordained by the bishop, and are authorized to assist in the administration of the eucharist, to administer the rites of baptism and marriage, and to perform the duties of a traveling preacher. (g) In the Baptist and Congregational churches, one of two or more officers elected by each church to distribute the elements in the communion after they have been consecrated by the minister, and to act as the advisers of the pastor and as the laborers of the charities of the church. (h) In the Presbyterian Church, one of a number of officers elected by a congregation and ordained by the minister to assist the session in the care of the poor and in the general management of the secular affairs of the church. Deacons are not always appointed, their place being sometimes supplied by the elders. (i) In the Lutheran Church in the United States, one of a number of laymen chosen to attend to the charities and temporalities of a congregation. With an equal number of elders and the pastor, the deacons constitute the council of each church to manage its temporal and spiritual affairs. (j) In the Mormon Church, a subordinate official who acts as an assistant to the teacher, but has no authority to baptize or administer the sacrament. Mormon Catechism, xvii.

2. In Scotland, the president of an incorporated trade, who is the chairman of its meetings and signs its records. Before the passing of the Burgh Reform Act the deacons of the crafts or incorporated trades in royal burghs formed a constituent part of the town council, and were understood to represent the trades, as distinguished from the merchants and guild brethren. The deacon-convenor of the trades in Edinburgh and Glasgow still continues to be a constituent member of the town council.

3. [Allusion not clear.] A green salted hide or skin weighing less than 8 pounds.—Cardinal deacon. See cardinal.—Deacons' seat, in New England, a pew formerly made in the front of the pulpit for deacons to occupy.—Regency deacon, in the early church, a deacon attached to one of the seven ecclesiastical regions into which Rome was divided from very early times. There was one deacon for each region.

deacon (dē'kn), v. t. [deacon, n.] 1. To make or ordain deacon.—2. To read out, as a line of a psalm or hymn, before singing it; sometimes with off: from an ancient custom of reading the hymn one or two lines at a time, the congregation singing the lines as read. This office was frequently performed by a deacon. The custom is nearly as old as the Reformation, and was made necessary by the lack of hymn-books when congregational singing was introduced. See live, v. t.

A prayer was made, and the chorister deaconed the first two lines. Goodrich, Reminiscences, I. 77.

3. To arrange so as to present a specious and attractive appearance; present the best and largest specimens (of fruit or vegetables) to view and conceal the defective ones: as, to deacon strawberries or apples. [Slang, U. S.] [This sense contains a humorous allusion to the thrifty habits ascribed to the rural New England deacons.] Hence—4. To sophisticate; adulterate; "doctor": as, to deacon wine or other liquor. [Slang.]—Deaconed veal, veal unfit for use, as when killed too young. [Connecticut.]

deaconess (dē'kn-es), n. [Formerly also deaconise; = D. diakoness = G. diakonissa = Dan. diakonisse = F. diakonisse, diakonisse = Sp. Pg. diaconisa = It. diaconessa, < ML. diaconissa, fem. of diaconus, deacon: see deacon and -essa.] 1. One of an ecclesiastical order of women in the early church, who discharged for members of their own sex those parts of the diaconal office which could not conveniently or fitly be performed by men. They acted as doorkkeepers and kept order on the women's side of the congregation, assisted at the baptism of women and administered the unction before baptism except the anointing of the forehead, instructed female catechumens, took charge of sick and poor women, and were present at interviews of the clergy with women. Such an order was especially needed in those Christian countries where Oriental seclusion of women prevailed. Deaconesses were required to remain unmarried, and were generally selected from the consecrated virgins or from the order of widows. In the Eastern Church the order continued into the middle ages, but it is not certain when it became extinct. In the Western Church it was abolished by successive decrees of councils during the fifth and succeeding centuries, and became finally extinct about the tenth. Abbesses were sometimes called deaconesses after the order became obsolete.

And Rom. xvi. I commend unto you Phoebe, the deaconess of the church of Cenchris. Tyndale, Works, p. 250.

2. Epiphanius: There is an order of deaconesses in the church, but not to meddle, or to attempt any of the holy offices. Jer. Taylor, Office Ministerial.

3. A member of an order of women more or less fully established in recent times in several Protestant churches, with duties similar to the preceding; also, a member of the Institution of Deaconesses first established by Pastor Fliedner, of the United Evangelical Church of Prussia, at Kaiserswerth in 1838. The latter are wholly devoted, by engagements for fixed periods to charitable work, as the nursing of the sick, &c. They reside in separate houses, which have been established in many parts of the world.

deaconhood (dē'kn-hūd), n. [deacon + -hood.]

1. The office or ministry of a deacon; deaconship.—2. A body of deacons taken collectively. deaconry (dē'kn-ri), n. [deacon + -ry.] Deaconship.

The deacons of all these churches should make up a common deaconry, and be deacons in common unto all these churches in an ordinary way, as the other elders. Goodrich, Works, IV. iv. 128.

deacon-seat (dē'kn-sēt), n. A long settee used by lumbermen in camp. It is hewn from a single log, is usually a foot wide and five or six inches thick, and is raised about eighteen inches from the floor. [U. S. and Canada.]

deaconship (dē'kn-ship), n. [deacon + -ship.] The office, dignity, or ministry of a deacon or deaconess.

Even the apostolate itself [was] called a deaconship. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1885), II. 21.

dead (ded), a. and n. [Early mod. E. also ded; < ME. ded, deed, dead, dyed, < AS. deadd = OE. dead = OFries. dead, deith = MD. D. dood = MLG. dōt, dōd, LG. dod = OHG. MHG. dōt, G. tot, tot = Dan. død = Sw. död = Icel. deður = Goth. deaths, dead; orig. a pp. (with suffix -d, -th, etc.: see -ed and -th) of the strong verb represented by Goth. **dauan* (pret. **dau*, pp. **dauans*) = Icel. deyja (pret. dē, pp. dáttan), dis: see die. Dead is thus nearly equiv. to die, pp. of die. Cf. death.] 1. a. 1. Having ceased to live; being deprived of life, as an animal or vegetable organism; in that state in which all the functions of life or vital powers have ceased to act; lifeless.

The men are dead which sought thy life. Ex. iv. 19.

Old Lord Dartmouth is dead of age. Walpole, Letters, II. 224.

Hence—2. Having ceased from action or activity; deprived of animating or moving force; brought to a stop or cessation, final or temporary: as, dead machinery; dead affections.

All hopes of Virginia thus abandoned, it lay dead and obscured from 1560, till this year 1602, that Captain Gosnell, with 32, and himself in a small bark, set sail from Dartmouth upon the 25. of March.

Quoted in Capt. John Smith's True Travels, I. 105.

The crackling embers on the hearth are dead. B. Coleridge, Night.

The winds were dead for heat. Tennyson, Tiresias.

3. Not endowed with life; destitute of life; inanimate: as, dead matter.—4. Void of sensation or perception; insensible; numb: as, he was dead with sleep; dead to all sense of shame.

The messenger of so unhappy news Would faine have dyde: dead was his hart within. Spenser, F. Q., I. vii. 21.

Everything. Yes, even pain, was dead a little space. William Morris, Earthly Paradise, II. 257.

That white dome of St. Mark's had uttered in the dead ear of Venice "Know thou that for all these God will bring thee into judgment." Ruskin.

5. Having the appearance of being lifeless, as in a swoon.

Sir J. Minnes fell sick at Church, and going down the gallery stairs, fell down dead, but came to himself again, and is pretty well. Pepps, Diary, II. 168.

I presently fell dead on the floor, and it was with great difficulty I was brought back to life. Firdling, Amelia, I. 9.

6. Resembling death; still; motionless; deep: as, a dead sleep; a dead calm.

But in the dead time of the night, They set the field on fire. The Boyne Water (Child's Ballads, VII. 256).

In the dead waste and middle of the night. Shak., Hamlet, I. 2.

Her hand shook, and we heard In the dead hush the papers that she held Rustle. Tennyson, Princess, iv.

Slowly down the narrow canal, in that dead stillness which reigns in Venice, swept the sombre flotilla, bearing its unconscious burden to the Campo Santo. T. B. Aldrich, Pontopop to Penth, p. 20.

7. Utter; entire; complete; full: as, a dead stop.

Opposition; resolute antagonism; hostility: as, it was a dead-set between them. Bartlett.—4. A concerted scheme to defraud a person in gaming. Grose, Slang Dict. [Slang.]

II. a. Extremely desirous of, or determined to get or to do, something: generally with on or upon.

dead-sheave (ded'shēv), n. Naut., a score in the heel of a topmast to receive an additional mast-rope as a preventer.

dead-shore (ded'shōr), n. A piece of wood built up vertically in a wall which has been broken through for the purpose of making alterations in a building.

dead-small (ded'smāl), n. In coal-mining, the smallest coal which passes through the screens. [North. Eng.]

dead's-part (deds'pärt), n. In Scots law, that part of a man's movable succession which he is entitled to dispose of by testament, or that which remains of the movables over and above what is due to the wife and children. Sometimes dead man's part.

dead-spindle (ded'spin'dl), n. The spindle in the tail-stock or dead-head of a lathe, which does not rotate.

dead-stroke (ded'strök), n. Delivering a blow without recoil: as, a dead-stroke hammer. See drop-process.

dead-thraw (ded'thrä), n. [Scotch form of death-throe.] The death-throe.

Who ever heard of a door being barred when a man was in the dead-thraw? How d'ye think the spirit was to get awa through bolts and bars like these?

Scott, Guy Mannering, xvii.

dead-tongue (ded'tung), n. The water-hemlock, Eleutherococcus: so called from its paralyzing effects upon the organs of speech.

dead-water (ded'wä'tär), n. Naut., the water which eddies about a ship's stern during her progress. Also called eddy-water.

dead-weight (ded'wät), n. 1. A heavy or oppressive burden; a weight or burden that has to be borne without aid or without compensatory advantage.

The fact is, fine thoughts, enshrined in appropriate language, are dead-weights upon the stage, unless they are struck like sparks from the action of the fable.

Cornhill Mag.

The gentleness of Nature's growths or motions will, in time, burst asunder or wear away the proudest dead-weight man can heap upon them.

W. Phillips, Speeches, p. 42.

2. A name given to an advance by the Bank of England to the government on account of half-pay and pensions to retired officers of the army and navy.—3. Naut., the lading of a vessel when it consists of heavy goods; that part of the cargo, as coal, iron, etc., which pays freight according to its weight, and not to its bulk.

dead-well (ded'wel), n. Same as absorbing-well. See absorb.

dead-wind (ded'wind), n. Naut., an old term for a wind dead ahead, or blowing directly from the point toward which a ship is sailing.

dead-wood (ded'wüd), n. 1. In shipbuilding, a body of timber built up on top of the keel at either end, to afford a firm fastening for the cant timbers.—2. A buffer-block.—3. In ten-pins and pin-pool, the pins which have been knocked down. Hence—4. Useless material.

The commissioner [of patents] has made some effort—though not so strenuous as might be—to cut the dead-wood out of the examining and clerical forces left him as a legacy by his predecessor.

See Ames, N. S., LVII 209.

To get the dead-wood on one, to have one entirely at a disadvantage or in one's power; secure advantage over one. [U. S. slang.]

dead-wool (ded'wül), n. Wool taken from the skins of sheep which have been slaughtered or have died.

dead-work (ded'wërk), n. Work which is in itself unprofitable, but is necessary to, and leads up to, that which is profitable or productive; specifically, in mining, that work which is done in the way of opening a mine, or preparing to remove the ore in a mine, but is not accompanied by any production of ore, or is almost non-remunerative.

To describe dead-work is to narrate all those portions of our work which consume the most time, give the most trouble, require the greatest patience and endurance, and seem to produce the most insignificant results.

Science, VI. 174.

dead-works (ded'wërks), n. pl. Naut., the parts of a ship which are above the surface of the water when she is balanced for a voyage: now generally called upper works.

de-aerate (dë-ä'rät), v. t.; pret. and pp. de-aerated, pp. de-aerating. [de-priv. + aerate.] To expel the air from; free from air. [Rare.]

Dr. Mayer states that the gases employed in this research were obtained from the coals by introducing two to four hundred grains into a flask, which was immediately filled up with hot de-aerated water.

Ure, Dict., IV. 260.

deaf (def or däf), a. [Early mod. E. also deaf; ME. def, deaf, deft, deaf, etc., AS. deaf = OE. def = OFries. daf = D. doof = MLG. döf, LG. döf = *OHG. Mandeville, Travels, p. 206.

Deaf with the noise, I took my hasty flight.

Dryden.

3. Refusing to listen or to hear; unwilling to regard or give heed; unmoved or unpersuaded; insensible: as, deaf to entreaty; deaf to all argument or reason.

For God is daf now a dayes and deyneth nouht ons to huyre.

Piers Plowman (C), xii. 61.

To counsel this lady was deaf,
To judgment she was blind.

Margaret of Origny (Child's Ballads, VIII. 252).

Oh, the millions of deaf hearts, deaf to everything really impassioned in music, that pretend to admire Mozart!

De Quincey, Secret Societies, ii.

They might as well have blest her; she was deaf
To blessing or to cursing save from one.

Templeton, Geraint.

4. Lacking sharpness or clearness; dull; stifled; obscurely heard; confused. [Rare.]

No silence is within, nor voice express,
But a deaf noise of sounds that never cease.

Dryden.

Törpido is a fish, but who-so handleth hym shal be lame & dafs of lymmes that he shall fele no thyng.

Babes Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 229.

6. Barren; sterile; blasted: as, deaf land; deaf corn.

Every day, it seems, was separately a blank day, yielding absolutely nothing—what children call a deaf nut, offering no kernel.

De Quincey, Autobiog. Sketches, I. 91.

Deaf and dumb. See deaf-mute.—Deaf as a door, post, or stove, exceedingly deaf.

deaf, v. t. [Also deafe, early mod. E. also dove; *ME. *deafen*, **deren*, *AS. *deafian*, in comp. deafian, become deaf (= OFries. dafa = D. doven, tarnish, verdooven, deafen, = OHG. touben, MHG. touben, G. betauben, deafen, stun, = Iscl. deafa = Dan. döfs = Sw. döfsa), deaf, deaf; see deaf, a. Cf. deafen.] To make deaf; deprive of hearing; deafen; stun with noise.

Thou deafest me with thy keryng so loud.

Palgrave, sig. B III, fol. 206.

And lest their lamentable shrieks should and the hearts of their Parents, the Priests of Molech did deaf their ears with the continual clangs of trumpets and timbrels.

Sandys, Travels, p. 145.

An obstinate sinner . . . still deaf himself to the cry of his own conscience, that he may live the more licentiously.

Rev. T. Adams, Works, II. 41.

deaf-adder (def'ad'är), n. A popular name in the United States of sundry serpents reputed to be venomous.

deaf-dumbness (def'dum'nes), n. Dumbness or aphonia arising from deafness, whether congenital or occurring during infancy.

Deafness, resulting from functional or nervous derangement, from actual disease, or from deaf-dumbness.

B. W. Richardson, Prevent. Med., p. 198.

deafen (def'n), v. t. [deaf + -en. Cf. deaf, v.] 1. To make deaf; deprive of the power of hearing.—2. To stun; render incapable of perceiving or discriminating sounds distinctly: as, to be deafened with clamor or tumult.

And all the host of hell
Dandled by the livid-flashing fork.

Milton, P. L., li. 630.

And deafen d with the stammering crack and claps
That follow'd.

Templeton, Merlin and Vivien.

3. In aroh., to render impervious to sound (as a door or a partition) by means of sound-boarding or pugging.

deafening (def'n-ing), n. In aroh., the pugging used to prevent the passage of sound through floors, partitions, and the like. Also called sound-boarding.

deafy (def'li), adv. Without sense of sounds; obscurely heard.

deaf-mute (def'müt), n. [deaf + mute.] 1. A person who is both deaf and dumb, the dumbness resulting from deafness which has existed either from birth or from a very early period of the person's life. Deaf-mutes communicate their thoughts by means either of significant or arbitrary signs or motions, or of a manual alphabet formed by positions of the fingers of one or both hands.

The accompanying illustration shows a form of the single-hand alphabet now universally taught to deaf-mutes in the United States. The two-hand alphabet, invented about the close of the eighteenth century, is somewhat more complicated, and is limited use in other countries. Deaf-mutes are taught in many cases to understand spoken language by observing the motions of the speaker's lips, and to use articulate speech themselves, sometimes very distinctly.

2. A subject for dissection. [Med. slang.] deaf-muteness (def'müt'nes), n. [deaf-mute + -ness.] Deaf-dumbness.

Physiological accidents, more painful and not less incurable than those of deaf-muteness and blindness.

O. W. Holmes, Old Vol. of Life, p. 252.

deaf-mutism (def'müt'izm), n. [deaf-mute + -ism.] The condition of being a deaf-mute.

Deaf-mutism may give no actual indication of disease, though the organ of hearing itself is, probably, always defective and of imperfect development.

B. W. Richardson, Prevent. Med., p. 194.

deafness (def'nes), n. [ME. defnes, deaf, deaf + -ness.] 1. Incapacity of perceiving or distinguishing sounds, in consequence of the impairment of the organs of hearing; that state of the organs which prevents the reception of the impressions that constitute hearing; want of the sense of hearing. Deafness occurs in every degree, from that which merely impairs the accuracy of the ear in distinguishing faint or similar sounds, to that state in which there is no more sensation produced by sounds in this organ than in any other part of the body. Deafness is the usual concomitant of complete deafness, but in general results rather from the absence of incitement by the sense of hearing than from any natural defect in the organs of speech. See deaf-mute.

He answered that it was impossible for him to hear a man three yards off, by reason of deafness that had held him fourteen years.

State Trials, Earl of Strafford, an. 1640.

deal<sup>2</sup> (dél), n. [MD. dele, D. deel, a board, plank, threshing-floor, = MLG. dele, LG. dele, a board, plank, floor of a room, also, in form dale, a threshing-floor, = OHG. dāl, dālo, MHG. dāl, dille, G. diele, a board, plank, floor of boards, = Iscl. dija = Dan. dije = Sw. dija = AS. dēla, a plank, thille, a board (cf. breda thilling, translating L. area, a threshing-floor) (cf. Slov. dila = Pol. dyl = Little Russ. dyle, a board, deal—prob. < OHG.), = OBulg. dilo = Skt. dala, ground (cf. L. tellus, the earth). The AS. word has suffered a similar restriction of meaning, being now E. thill, the shaft or pole of a cart, etc. Thus deal<sup>2</sup> is a doublet of thill: see thill. The word deal<sup>2</sup> is usually identified with deal<sup>1</sup>, a part, with the accommodated definition "the division of a piece of timber made by sawing." 1. A board or plank. The name deal is applied chiefly to planks of pine or fir above 7 inches in width and of various lengths exceeding 6 feet. If 7 inches or less wide, they are called battens; and when under 6 feet long they are called deal-ends. The usual thickness is 1 inch, and width 9 inches. The standard size, to which other sizes may be reduced, is 2½ inches thick, 11 inches broad, and 12 feet long. A whole deal is a deal which is 1½ inches thick; a stik deal, one of half that thickness. The word is little used in the United States.

I had little furniture, so I bought a cart-load of deals: took a carpenter . . . into my service; established him in a barn, and said, "Jack, furnish my house."

2. Wood of fir or pine, such as deals are made from: as, a floor of deal.

A piece of deal, far thicker than one would easily imagine, being purposely interposed betwixt my eye placed in a room, and the clearer daylight, . . . appeared quite through a lovely red.

dean<sup>2</sup> (dēn), n. [ME. deen, dene, den, < OF. deien, mod. doyen = Pr. degua, doga = Ospr. deen, Sp. decano = Pg. dedo = It. decano (G. dekan, dechant = D. deken), < LL. decanus, one set over ten (soldiers, monks, etc.), < L. decem = E. ten: see decimal, ten.] 1. An ecclesiastical title in the Roman Catholic and Anglican churches, which has had several applications.

Civil officials so called were known to the Roman law, and are mentioned in the codes of Theodosius and Justinian. The title was thence adopted for Christian use. In the monasteries, for every ten monks a decanus or dean was nominated, who had the charge of their discipline. The senior dean, in the absence of the abbot and provost, governed the monastery; and, since monks had the charge of many cathedral churches, the office of dean was thence introduced into them. Custom gradually determined that there should be only one dean in a cathedral, and he eventually assumed the chief charge of its ecclesiastical and ritual concerns, especially in regard to the choir. He became also general assistant to the bishop. In the Roman Catholic Church, assistants of the bishop, termed rural deans, in France in former times often possessed, and in Germany in certain cases still possess, large powers of visitation, administration, and jurisdiction, so that their authority is almost equal to that of bishops. In the Church of England there are, besides the deans of the cathedrals, called deans of chapters, whose authority is next that of the bishop, rural deans, who are in effect assistants to the bishop, and whose duty it is to visit certain parishes in the diocese, and report on their condition to the bishop. Their functions at one time became almost obsolete, but they have been revived to some extent in recent times. The word is also applied in England to the chief officers of certain peculiar churches or chapels: as, the dean of the king's chapel. In the Episcopal Church in America the presiding presbyter of the semi-official body known as a convention, and of the division of a diocese represented by this body, which division is also called a convention and is in some respects analogous to the English rural deanery, is called a dean (the dean of convention).

To save a bishop, may I name a dean?

Pope, Epil. to Satires, II. 22.

2. In universities, originally, the head of a faculty (and most historical writers consider a dean as essential to the existence of a faculty). The office was at first directly or indirectly elective for one or two years, while commonly filled by the eldest master. But the faculties, having in Great Britain and America lost their early more independent corporate existence, are now usually presided over by the head of the university, and the office of dean has sunk to that of a mere registrar or secretary, or has ceased to exist. In English colleges the dean presides in chapel, looks after the moral and religious welfare of the scholars, and is charged with the preservation of discipline. The office is commonly united with one of the tutorships. The office of dean of a college or school is evidently a mere adaptation of that of dean of a monastery, and as such dates from far earlier times than that of dean of a faculty, although the faculties long preceded the colleges.

Certain canons, or deanes, appointed to look to the behaviour and manner of the students there (at Cambridge). Hollinshed, Chronicles.

He long'd at college, only long'd,

All else was well, for she-society. . . .
They lost their weeks; they vexed the souls of deans.

Tennyson, Princess, ProL

3. The oldest member in length of service of a constituted body, or a body of persons of equal rank, of whom he is the prescriptive leader in all joint action: as, the dean of the diplomatic corps; the dean of the French Academy; the dean of the Sacred College (the oldest of the cardinals, who possesses high authority by right of his seniority).—4. The president for the time being of an incorporation of barristers or law practitioners.—Dean and chapter, a bishop's council, consisting of the dean and his prebendaries, whose duties consist in aiding the bishop with their advice in affairs of religion and in the temporal concerns of his see.—Dean of Arches, the chief judicial officer of the Archbishop of Canterbury, dean of the Court of Arches, but not really a dean in the modern sense of the word.—Dean of Faculty, the president of the Faculty of Advocates in Scotland.—Dean of guild. (a) The chief officer of a medieval trade-gild, and of some existing gilds in Europe.

They represented that it had been customary to consult, after the city magistracy, only the captains of companies and the deans of guilds in matters of government.

Malley, Dutch Republic, III. 20.

(b) In Scotland, the elected head of the merchant company or gildry of a royal burgh, who is a magistrate of the burgh for the supervision of all matters relating to the erection and character of buildings. The office in the full sense now exists only in Edinburgh, Glasgow, Aberdeen, and Perth, its duties in other burghs being performed by an officer bearing the same title, elected by the town council.—Dean of gold coins, in Scotland, a court presided over by the dean of gold, the jurisdiction of which is confined to the regulation of buildings, to such matters of police as have any connection with buildings, and to the regulation of weights and measures.—Dean of penitentiaries. See penitentiary.—Dean of the chapel royal, a title bestowed on six clergymen of the Church of Scotland, who receive from the crown a portion of the revenues which formerly belonged to the chapel royal in Scotland.—Dean of the province of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, to whom, when a convocation is to be assembled, the archbishop sends his mandate for summoning the bishops of the province.

deanery (dē'ne-ri), n.; pl. deaneries (-ries). [dean + -ry. Cf. MLL. decanaria, a deanery.]

1. The office or the revenue of a dean.

When he could no longer keep the deanery of the chapel-royal, he made him his successor in that near attendance upon the king. Clarendon, Great Rebellion.

2. The house of a dean.

Take her by the hand, away with her to the deanery, and dispatch it quickly. Shak., M. W. of W., v. 3.

3. The jurisdiction of a dean.

Each archdeaconry is divided into rural deaneries, and each deanery is divided into parishes. Blackstone.

Rural deanery, in England, the circuit of jurisdiction of a rural dean. Every rural deanery is divided into parishes. The duties of rural deans are now generally discharged by archdeacons, though the deaneries still exist as an ecclesiastical division of the dioceses or archdeaconry. See dean.

deanness (dē'nees), n. [dean + -ness.] The wife of a dean. Sterne.

deanimalize (dē-an'i-mal-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. deanimalized, ppr. deanimalizing. [de-priv. + animalize.] To free from animality or animal qualities: as, to deanimalize wool-fiber. [Rare.]

Because I don't value your deanship a straw. Swift.

deanthropomorphism (dē-an'thrō-pō-mōr'-fizm), n. [deanthropomorphize + -ism.] The process of getting rid of anthropomorphic notions.

Hence, as Mr. Fiske has shown in detail, as soon as anthropomorphism has assumed its highest state of development, it begins to be replaced by a continuous growth of deanthropomorphism, which, passing through polytheism into monotheism, eventually ends in a progressive "purification" of theism—by which is meant a progressive metamorphosis of the theistic conception, tending to remove from the Deity the attributes of Humanity.

Contemporary Rev., L. 22.

deanthropomorphization (dē-an'thrō-pō-mōr'-s-āz-ā-shn), n. [deanthropomorphize + -ation.]

The act of freeing from anthropomorphic attributes or conceptions.

There is one continuous process of knowing, which (if I may be allowed to invent a rather formidable word in imitation of Coleridge) is best described as a continuous process of deanthropomorphization, or the stripping off of the anthropomorphic attributes with which primeval philosophy clothed the unknown Power which is manifested in phenomena. J. Fiske, Cosmic Philos., I. 176.

deanthropomorphize (dē-an'thrō-pō-mōr'-fiz), v. t.; pret. and pp. deanthropomorphized, ppr. deanthropomorphizing. [de-priv. + anthropomorphize.] To free from anthropomorphic attributes or notions.

We may proceed to gather our illustrations of the deanthropomorphizing process. J. Fiske, Cosmic Philos., I. 177.

dear (dē), a. and n. [Early mod. E. also deere, deere, < ME. deere, deere, < AS. deora, mutated dýre, beloved, precious, of great value, = OS. dhuri = OFries. dhore, dhore = D. diere, diere = OHG. dhuri, MHG. dhure, G. theuer = Icel. dýrr = Sw. Methinks I am partaker of thy passion,
And in this case do glean my own debility.
Str. F. Sidney.

Among the debilities of the government of the Confederation, none was more distinguished or more distressing than the utter impossibility of obtaining from the States the monies necessary for the payment of debts, or even for the ordinary expenses of the government.

Jefferson, Autobio., p. 67.

Specifically — 2. In med., that condition of the body, or of any of its organs, in which the vital functions are discharged with less than normal vigor, the amount of power and activity displayed being reduced. — 3. In astrol., a weakness of a planet, due to its position: the reverse of a dignity. — Syn. Debility, Infirmitas, Imbecility, all express a want of strength. Debility is rarely used except of physical weakness; infirmitas applies to both bodily and mental weakness; imbecility has passed from bodily weakness to mental, so as to be obsolete in application to the former. Debility is a general insufficiency of strength;
infirmitas, whether physical or mental, is local or special:
as, his infirmitas is lameness, he has various mental in- firmities. Imbecility is general, and may amount to idio-
cy. See disease and illness.

It was not one of those periods of overstrained and convulsive exertion which necessarily produce debility and languor.
Macaulay, Hallam's Const. Hist.

Men with natural infirmities, when they attempt things those very infirmities have rendered them incapable of executing, are fit objects for satire.

Jon Bar, Essay on Samuel Foots.

That incomparable diary of Land's, which we never see without forgetting the view of his heart in the imbecility of his intellect.

decapite (de-kap-i-tä'), a. [F. décapité, pp. of decapiter, decapitate.] In her., having the head cut off smoothly: said of an animal used as a bearing. Also decapit. Compare couped.

decapod (dek-a-pod), a. and n. [NL. decapus (neut. pl. decapoda), < Gr. dekapous, having ten feet (used only in sense of 'ten feet long'), < deka, = E. ten, + πους (pod-) = E. foot.] 1. a. Having ten feet, as a crustacean, or ten rays or arms, as a cephalopod; pertaining to the Decapoda in either sense. Also decapodal, decapodous.

II. n. 1. In Crustacea, a decapodous or ten-footed crustacean, as a crab, lobster, shrimp, or prawn; one of the Decapoda.—2. In Mollusca, a decapodous or ten-armed cephalopod; one of the Decapoda.

Also, rarely, decapode.

Decapoda (de-kap'ö-dä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of decapus, having ten feet: see decapod.] 1. The ten-footed crustaceans; those Crustacea which have five pairs of legs or ambulatory appendages, at least one pair of which is chelate; an order of podophthalmic or stalk-eyed Crustacea. See cuts under Podophthalmia and stalk-eyed. They have the branches inclosed in special lateral thoracic receptacles; a large dorsal carapace or cephalothoracic shield, formed by fusion of the cephalic and thoracic somites, and usually prolonged in front as a beak or rostrum; gnathites or mouth-parts consisting of a pair of mandibles, two pairs of maxillae, and three pairs of maxillipeds or foot-jaws; and five pairs of ambulatory legs, the first pair of which is usually enlarged, and otherwise modified into great pincer-like claws or chelipeds. The shell is regularly shed, annually or oftener, as long as the animal continues to grow. The order presents two extremes of form, according to the development and construction of the abdominal segments or "tail." In the long-tailed or macrurous Decapoda, as the lobster, shrimp, prawn, and crawfish, the abdomen is protruded, jointed, and flexible. In the short-tailed or brachyurous Decapoda, as the crabs, it is reduced and folded under the thorax, forming the apron. Various intermediate conditions are also found, as in the hermit-crabs. In consequence, the Decapoda are divided into Macrura and Brachyura, with or without an intermediate group Anomura. See these words.

2. The ten-armed cephalopods; a division of the dibranchiate or acetaluliferous Cephalopoda, as distinguished from Octopoda, having two long tentacles or cephalic processes (besides the eight arms or rays), bearing suckers only at their ends: also called Decacera. The division includes all except the Octopoda and Argonauta, or the cuttle, calamaries, squids, etc., of such families as Spirulidae, Bolitaenidae, Septidae, Septoidae, Loliginidae, Chroteuthidae, Lolipodidae, and Cranichidae. See second cut under cuttle.

decapodal (de-kap'ö-däl), a. [decapod + -al.] Same as decapod.

decapode (dek-a-pöde), a. and n. Same as decapod. [Rare.]

decapodiform (dek-a-pod'i-förm), a. [NL. decapus (-pod-), decapod, + L. forma, shape.] In entom., similar in form to a lobster or crawfish: applied to certain aquatic, carnivorous, hexapod larvae with elongate tapering bodies, and swimming-lamellae on the tail. The young of the coleopterous Dytiscus and the neuropterous Agrion are examples of this form.

decapodous (de-kap'ö-dus), a. [decapod + -ous.] Same as decapod.

Decapterygii (de-kap-ter-i-j'i), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. deka, = E. ten, + πτερυξ (pteryx), a fin.] An order of fishes, containing those with ten fins. Bloch and Schneider.

decarbonate (de-kär'bä-nät), v. t.; pret. and pp. decarbonated, ppr. decarbonating. [= F. decarbonater; as de priv. + carbonate, v.] To deprive of carbon.

decarbonisation (de-kär'bä-nä-sä'shon), n. [decarbonise + -ation.] Same as decarbonisation.

decarbonise (de-kär'bä-nis), v. t.; pret. and pp. decarbonised, ppr. decarbonising. [= F. decarboniser; as de priv. + carboniser.] Same as decarbonise.

decarbonizing (de-kär'bä-niz-ing), v. t.; pret. and pp. decarbonized, ppr. decarbonizing. [= F. decarboniser; as de priv. + carboniser.] Same as decarbonise.

decarbonization (de-kär'bä-nä-sä'shon), n. [decarbonise + -ation.] Same as decarbonisation.

decarbonize (de-kär'bä-nis), v. t.; pret. and pp. decarbonized, ppr. decarbonizing. [= F. decarboniser; as de priv. + carboniser.] Same as decarbonise.

decarbonization (de-kär'bä-nä-sä'shon), n. [decarbonise + -ation.] Same as decarbonisation.

decarbonize (de-kär'bä-nis), v. t.; pret. and pp. decarbonized, ppr. decarbonizing. [= F. decarboniser; as de priv. + carboniser.] Same as decarbonise.

decarbonizing (de-kär'bä-niz-ing), v. t.; pret. and pp. decarbonized, ppr. decarbonizing. [= F. decarboniser; as de priv. + carboniser.] Same as decarbonise.

decarbonization (de-kär'bä-nä-sä'shon), n. [decarbonise + -ation.] Same as decarbonisation.

decarbonize (de-kär'bä-nis), v. t.; pret. and pp. decarbonized, ppr. decarbonizing. [= F. decarboniser; as de priv. + carboniser.] Same as decarbonise.

The process of depriving of carbon: as, the decarbonization of cast-iron (a process resorted to in order to convert cast-iron into steel, or to reduce it to the state of malleable iron). Also decarbonisation, decarbonisation.

decarbure (de-kär'bä-ris), v. t.; pret. and pp. decarbured, ppr. decarburing. [de priv. + carbure. Cf. F. decarburer.] To deprive wholly or in part of carbon: the opposite of carbure.

Thus, cast-iron is partly decarbured in making steel; pig-iron is decarbured by cementation. See cementation. Also decarbure, decarbure.

decard (de-kär'd), v. t. [de + card.] See decard. To discard.

Pedro. I would not task those sins to me committed.
Rod. You cannot, sir; you have cast those by, discarded 'em.

Flatcher, Fligim, iv, 2.

decardinalize (de-kär'di-näl-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. decardinalized, ppr. decardinalizing. [= F. decardinaliser; as de priv. + cardinal + -ize.] To depose from the rank of cardinal. [Rare.]

He [the Cardinal of Guise] is but young, and they speak of a Bull that is to come from Rome to decardinalise him.

Howell, Letters, I, ii, 19.

decare (de-kär'), n. [F. décare, < Gr. deka, = E. ten, + F. are: see are.] In the metric system, a superficial measure, equal to ten times the are—that is, a thousand square meters, or very nearly a quarter of an English acre.

decarination (de-kär-nä'shon), n. [de priv. + carination, after incarnation.] The putting off or laying aside of carnality or fleshly lusts.

For God's incarnation inableneth man for his own decarination, as I may say, and devouture of carnality.

W. Montagu, Devouta Remays, ii, 1.

decasemic (dek-a-sē'mik), a. [Gr. dekasmos, < deka, ten, + sema, a sign, σημα, a sign, mark, note, unit of metrical measurement, mora.] In anc. pros., consisting of ten units of metrical measurement: as, a decasemic colon.

decasepalous (dek-a-sēp'a-lus), a. [Gr. deka, = E. ten, + NL. sepalum, sepal.] In bot., having ten sepals.

decastere (dek-a-stēr), n. [F. décastère, < Gr. deka, = E. ten, + F. stère, < Gr. στέρη, solid: see stere.] In the metric system, a solid measure, ten times the stère or cubic meter, and nearly equal to 13.08 cubic yards. Also spelled decastere.

decastich (dek'a-stik), n. [Gr. deka, = E. ten, + στιχ, a verse.] A poem consisting of ten lines.

decastyle (dek'a-stil), a. [= F. décastyle = Sp. decastilo = Pg. decastilo = It. decastilo, < Gr. dekasstylos, < deka, = E. ten, + στυλος, a column: see style.] Having ten columns in front, or consisting of ten columns: as, a decastyle temple or portico.

Milton, Areopagitica, p. 14.

decay (dē-kā'), n. [< decay, v.] 1. Gradual loss of soundness or perfection; a falling by degrees into an impaired condition or state; impairment in general; loss of strength, health, intellect, etc.

And the seyd Churches wyth all the places falleth in gret decay.
Torkington, Diarie of Eng. Travell, p. 49.
 I, wofull wight,
 Against my conscience heere did fight,
 And brought my followers all unto decay.
Thomas Stukely (Child's Ballads, VII. 311).
 He who hath bent him o'er the dead
 Ere the first day of death is fled, . . .
 Before Decay's effacing fingers
 Have swept the lines where beauty lingers.
Byron, The Giaour, l. 72.

His [Johnson's] failure was not to be ascribed to intellectual decay.
Macaulay.
 Specifically — 2. Decomposition; putrefaction; rot. — 3. Death; dissolution.

Gilt colour was for his decay,
 That set unhappy he was slain
Battle of Harlow (Child's Ballads, VII. 189).
 She forth was brought in sorrowfull dismay
 For to receive the doome of her decay.
Spenser, F. Q., v. xii. 12.

Moses and Elias, who appeared in glory, and spoke of his decease which he should accomplish at Jerusalem.
Luke ix. 30, 31.
 —Syn. Death, Decease, Demise. Death is the common term for the ending of life. Decease is slightly euphemistic; it is less forcible and harsh than death. Demise applies primarily to a sovereign, who at death sends down or transmits his title, etc. (see quotation from Blackstone, under demise), and hence to others with reference to the transmission of their possessions. The use of demise for death apart from this idea is figurative, euphemistic, or stilted.

Among the Lepthas, the houses where there has been a death is almost always forsaken by the surviving inmates.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 130.

She had the care of Lady Ida's youth,
 And from the Queen's decease she brought her up.
Tennyson, Princess, III.

There is such a difference between dying in a sunset with a cambric handkerchief at one's eyes, and the prosaic reality of decease certified in the parish register.

Cf. conceit, receipt.*] 1. The quality of being false or misleading; falseness; falsehood; deception; deceptiveness.

O, that deceit should dwell
 In such a gorgeous palace! Shak., R. and J., III. 2.

2. The act or practice of deceiving; concealment or perversion of the truth for the purpose of misleading; fraud; cheating.

And thus often tyme he was revenged of his enemyes, be his sotylye decyetes and false Cautelles.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 280.

3. That which deceives; action or speech designed to mislead or beguile; a guileful artifice.

My lips shall not speak wickedness, nor my tongue utter deceit.
Job xxvii. 4.

They . . . imagine deceits all the day long.
Ps. xxxviii. 12.

4. In law, any trick, device, craft, collusion, false representation, or underhand practice, used to defraud another: now more commonly called fraud or misrepresentation. — Syn. 1 and 2. Deceit, Deception, Fraud, craft, cunning, duplicity, double-dealing, guile, trickery, williness, treachery, knavery, imposture. Deceit is a shorter and more energetic word for deception, indicating the quality; it is also, but more rarely, used to express the act or manner of deceiving. The reverse is true of deception, which is properly the act or course by which one deceives, and not properly the quality; it may express the state of being deceived. Fraud is an act or a series of acts of deceit by which one attempts to benefit himself at the expense of others. It is generally a breaking of law; the others are not. See artifice and deception.

Perhaps, as a child of deceit,
 She might by a true deceit be untrue.

And fall into deception unaware. Milton, P. L., ix. 302.

Behold, the hire of the labourers who have reaped down your fields, which is of you kept back by fraud, orioth.
Jer. v. 4.

deceitful (dē-sēt'-fūl), a. [< deceit + -fūl.] Full of deceit; tending to mislead, deceive, or ensnare; tricky; fraudulent; cheating.

His hardest labour in his tongue, as if he were loath to vee so deceitful an Organ.
Sp. Servs, Microcosmographie, A Child.

The smiles of joy, the tears of woe,
 Deceitful shine, deceitful flow,
 There's nothing true but Heaven.
Morse, This world is all a fleeting show

—Syn. Deceptive, Deceitful, etc. (see deceptive), delusive, fallacious, insincere, hypocritical, false, hollow.
deceitfully (dē-sēt'-fūl-ē), adv. In a deceitful manner; fraudulently; with deceit; in a manner or with a view to deceive.

The state or quality of being decent, fit, suitable, or becoming; propriety of action, speech, dress, etc.; proper formality; becoming ceremony; modesty; specifically, freedom from ribaldry or obscenity.

The Greeks call this good grace of every thing in his kind, re spectus, the Latines [decorum], we in our vulgar call it by a scholasticall turne [decency].
Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poetrie, p. 219.

Sentiments which raise laughter can very seldom be admitted with any decency into an heroic Poem.
Addison, Spectator, No. 279.

The consideration immediately subsequent to the being of a thing is what agrees or disagrees with that thing, what is suitable or unsuitable to it; and from this springs the notion of decency or indecency, that which becomes or misbecomes.

Immodest words admit of no defence,
For want of decency is want of sense.
Roscommon, On Translated Verse, l. 114.

2. That which is decent or becoming.

The external decencies of worship. Sp. Attorbury.

He became careless of the decencies which were expected from a man so highly distinguished in the literary and political world.

God teacheth what honor is decent for the king, and for all other men according unto their vocations.

Latimer, 1st Sermon bef. Edw. VI., 1549.

That which he doth well and commendably is euer decent, and the contrary vndecent.

Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poetrie, p. 231.

But since there must be ornaments both in painting and poetry, if they are not necessary, they must at least be decent: that is, in their due parallel, and but moderately used.

Dryden, Parallel of Poetry and Painting.

A decent behaviour and appearance in church is what charms me.

Goldsmith, Vicar, x.

Specifically.—2. Proper with regard to modesty; free from indelicacy; conformable to some standard of modesty.

The Eunomians seem to have been of opinion . . . that it was not decent for them to be stripped at the performance of this religious rite.

Jortin, Remarks on Eccles. Hist.

3. Moderate; respectable; fair; tolerable; passable; good enough: as, a decent fortune; he made a very decent appearance.

Even at this day, a decent prose style is the rarest of accomplishments in Germany.

Dr. Quenry, Rhetoric.

It was only as an inspired and irresponsible person that he [Milton] could live on decent terms with his own self-conscious individuality.

Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 273.

Salons the parent and Spalato the child are names which never can become meaningless to any one who has a decent knowledge of the history of the world.

E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 176.

decently (dē'sent-li), adv. 1. In a decent or becoming manner; with propriety of behavior or speech; with modesty.

Past hope of safety, 'twas his latest care,
Like falling Caesar, devoutly to die.

Dryden.

Pho! pho! do the thing decently, and like a Christian.

Shiridan, The Rivals, III. 4.

2. Tolerably; passably; fairly. [Colloq.]

The greater part of the pieces it contains may be said to be very decently written.

Edinburgh Rev., I. 432.

decentness (dē'sent-nes), n. Decency.

decentralization (dē-sen'tral-i-zā'shŭn), n. [= F. décentralisation; as decentralize + -ation.] The act of decentralizing, or the state of being decentralized; specifically, in politics, the act or principle of removing local or special functions of government from the immediate direction or control of the central authority; opposed to centralization.

In France, as the feudal life ran its course, everything gradually tended to unity, monarchy, centralization; in Germany, the spirit of locality, separation, decentralization prevailed.

Stillé, Hand. Med. Hist., p. 100.

decentralize (dē-sen'tral-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. decentralized, ppr. decentralizing. [= F. décentraliser; as de-priv + centralise.] To distribute or take away from a center, or a central situation or authority; disperse, as what has been brought together, concentrated, or centralized.

Our population and wealth have increased and become more and more decentralized.

Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 484.

But in large societies that become predominantly industrial, there is added a decentralizing regulating system for the industrial structure.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 570.

decephalization (dē-sen't-si-āl-izā'shŭn), n. [< de-cephal- + -ation.] In sociol., simplification or degradation of cephalic parts; reduction of the head in complexity or specialization of its parts; the process of decephalizing, or the state of being decephalized; opposed to cephalization.

decephalizing (dē-sēp'ə-līz), v. t.; pret. and pp. decephalized, ppr. decephalizing. [< de-priv. + Gr. cephalē, head, + -ize.] In zoot., to cause or effect decephalization in or of; reduce, degrade, or simplify the parts of the head of; remove weight or force of cephalic parts backward; opposed to cephalizing.

deceptibility (dē-sēp-ti-bil'i-ti), n. [< deceptible + -ity.] Capability or liability of being deceived; deceptibility.

The deceptibility of our decayed natures.
Glennville, Vanity of Dogmatizing, viii.

deceptible (dē-sēp'ti-bl), a. [< OF. deceptibilis (also deceptibilis), < L. as if *deceptibilis, < deceptus, pp. of deceper, deceive: see deceive.] Capable of being deceived; deceivable.

Popular errors . . . are more nearly founded upon an erroneous inclination of the people, as being the most deceptible part of mankind, and ready with open arms to receive the encroachments of error.

deception (dē-sēp'shon), n. [< ME. deceptioun, < OF. deceptions, F. deceptions = Pr. deceptio = Sp. deceptioun = It. decessione, < L.L. deceptio(n)-, < deceptus, deceive: see deceive.] 1. The act of deceiving or misleading.

All deception is a misapplying of those signs which, by compact or institution, were made the means of men's signifying or conveying their thoughts.
South.

2. The state of being deceived or misled.

We cannot unite the incompatible advantages of reality and deception, the clear discernment of truth and the exquisite enjoyment of fiction.
Macleay.

3. That which deceives; artifice; cheat; as, the scheme is all a deception. = Syn. 1 and 3. Devil, Deception, Fraud. See deceit. — 2. Trick, imposition, ruse, wil.

deceptionist (dē-sēp'shun), a. [< OF. deceptivus, deceptivus, < ML. deceptivus, deceitful, < L.L. deceptio(n)-, deception: see deception.] Tending to deceive; deceitful.

Yet there is a credence in my heart,
As evermore so obstinately strong,
That doth invert the attaint of eyes and ears,
As if those organs had deceptions functions, Created only to calumniate. Shak., T. and C., v. 2.

deceptitious (dē-sēp'tish'us), a. [< L. deceptivus, pp. of deceper, deceive, + -itious.] Tending to deceive. [Rare.]

Arrangements competent to the process of investigation are in every case necessary, to preserve the aggregate mass of evidence from being untrustworthy and deceptitious on the score of incompleteness.
Brinkman, Prin. of Judicial Evidence, ii. 3.

deceptive (dē-sēp'tiv), a. [< OF. deceptif, F. deceptif = Pr. deceptivus = Sp. deceptivo, < L. as if *deceptivus, < deceptus, pp. of deceper, deceive: see deceive.] Tending to deceive; apt or having power to mislead or impress false opinions; as, a deceptive countenance or appearance. — Deceptive cadences, in music. See interrupted cadence, under cadence. = Syn. Deceptive, Deceitful, Fraudulent, delusive, fallacious, false, misleading. Essentially, the same distinction holds among the first three words as among deception, deceit, and fraud (see deceit). Deceptive does not necessarily imply intent to deceive; deceitful always does. Fraudulent is much stronger, implying that the intention is criminal. See fallacious.

The word "fishes" can be used in two senses, one of which has a deceptive appearance of adjustability to the "Mosaic" account.

Huxley, in Nineteenth Century, XIX. 196.

Woman!
Destructive, damnable, deceitful woman!

Orway, Orphan, iii. 1.
One writer gravely assures us that Maurice of Saxony learned all his fraudulent policy from that execrable volume [Machiavelli's "Prince"]. Macleay, Machiavelli.

deceptively (dē-sēp'tiv-ly), adv. In a manner to deceive.

deceptiveness (dē-sēp'tiv-nēs), n. The power of deceiving; tendency or aptness to deceive.

deceptivity (dē-sēp'tiv-i-ti), n. [< deceptivus + -ity.] 1. The quality of being deceptive. — 2. Something deceptive; a sham. Carlyle. [Rare.]

deceptor (dē-sēp'tōr), a. [< OF. deceptor = Sp. Pg. deceptorio, < L.L. deceptorius, < deceptor, a deceiver, < L. deceptus, deceive: see deceive.] Tending to deceive; containing qualities or means adapted to mislead. [Rare.]

decebrine (dē-sēr'ē-bris), v. t.; pret. and pp. decebrined, ppr. decebrining. [< de-priv. + cerebrum + -ize.] To deprive of the cerebrum; remove the cerebrum from. [Rare.]

decern (dē-sēr'n), v. [< OF. decerner, decerner, decerner, F. decerner = Pr. decernir = Sp. decernir = It. decernere, < L. decernere, pp. of decerno, decide, determine, judge, decree, < de- from, + cerno, separate, distinguish, discern: see concern, discern, and cf. deceve.] The word decern in L. and Rom. has been in part merged in decern.] 1. trans. 1. In Scots law, to decree; judge; adjudge.

The lords decerned him to give Frendraught a new tack of the said lands.

Spalding, Hist. Troubles in Scotland, i. 51.

2. To discern; discriminate.

They can see nothing, nor decern what maketh for them, nor what against them. Crommer, Sacraments, fol. 82.

II. intrans. In Scots law, to decree; pass judgment; an essential word in all decrees and interlocutors.

The said lords and estates of parliament find, decern, and declare that the said Francis, sometime earl of Bothwell, has committed and done open treason.

Scottish Acts, Jan. I., 1592.

decerner (dē-sēr'nēr), n. One who gives a judgment or an opinion.

Those alight and vulgar decerners.
Glennville, Lux Orientalis, Pref.

decerniture (dē-sēr'ni-tūr), n. [< decern + -iture.] In Scots law, a decree or sentence of a court; as, he resolved to appeal against the decerniture of the judge.

decernment, n. [< decern + -ment; var. of discernment.] Discernment.

A yet more refined elective discretion or discernment.
Goodwin, Works, III. 428.

deceprt (dē-sērp'), v. t. [< L. decerpere, pp. decerptus, pluck off, < de- off, + carpere, pluck: see carp.] To pluck off; crop; tear; rend.

O what misery was the people then in! O howe this most noble isle of the world was decerpt and rent to pieces!

deceptible (dē-sēp'ti-bl), a. [< L. deceptus, pp., + -ibilis.] That may be plucked.

deception (dē-sēp'shon), n. [< L. deceptus, pp.: see decept.] 1. The act of pulling or plucking off; a cropping. — 2. That which is pulled off or separated; a fragment.

If our souls are but particles and deceptions of our parents, then I must be guilty of all the sins that ever were committed by my progenitors ever since Adam.

Glennville, Pre-existence of Souls, iii.

decertation (dē-sēr'tā'shon), n. [< L. decertatio(n)-, < decertare, contend, < de + certare, fight, contend.] Strife; contest for mastery.

A decertation between the disease and nature.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err.

de certificando (dē sēr'ti-fī-kan'dō), [ML.: L. de, of, to; ML. certificando, abl. of certificandus, ger. of certificare, certify: see certify.] In early Eng. law, the short name of a writ requiring an officer to certify to the court something within his cognizance.

decease, n. A Middle English form of decease. deceasment (dē-sēsh'mēnt), n. [< OF. decessiō = Sp. (obs.) decessiō, < L. decessiō(n)-, a departure, < decedere, pp. decessus, depart: see decide, decease.] Departure; decrease; diminution.

(Implying the necessity of a bishop to govern in their absence or decession any ways) they ordained St. James the first bishop of Jerusalem.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1825), II. 162.

Blindness, dumbness, deafness, silence, death,
All which are neither natures by themselves
Nor substances, but mere decays of form,
And absolute decessions of nature.

Chapman, Byron's Conspiracy, l. 1.

The accession and decession of the matter.

W. Scott, Essay on Drapery, p. 7.

decessor (dē-sēs'or), n. [< L. decessor, a retiring officer, L.L. a predecessor, < decedere, pp. decessus, depart, retire: see decide, decease.] A predecessor.

David . . . humbled himself for the sins of his ancestors and decessors. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1825), I. 777.

decharm (dē-chārm'), v. t. [< OF. decharmer, decharmer, F. décharmer, < de-, priv., + charmer, charm: see charm.] To remove the spell or enchantment of; disenchant.

Notwithstanding the help of physick, he was suddenly cured by decharming the witchcraft. Harvey.

déchaussé (dē-ahō-sā'), a. [F., pp. of déchausser, take off one's shoes, make bare, < dé-, from, away, + chausser, shoe, < chaussé, a shoe, < L. calceus, a shoe.] In her.: (a) Dimembered and the different parts represented as separated from one another by a little distance: said of an animal used as a bearing: as, a lion déchaussé. (b) Without claws: said of an animal used as a bearing: a term of French heraldry, sometimes used in English.

Also dimembered. decheerful (dē-chēer'fūl), a. [Irreg. < de-priv. + cheerful.] Not cheerful; sad; depressed; gloomy.

decidedly

When didst thou ever come to me but with thy head hanging down? O decebring pretence, uncomfortable servant!
Hudson, Your Five Gallants, iv. 7.

dechenite (dech'en-it), n. [Named after the German geologist E. H. K. von Dechen (1800-1890).] A native vanadate of lead, occurring massive, with botryoidal structure, and of yellowish- or brownish-red color.

dechlorometer (dē-klō-rōm'e-tēr), n. Same as chlorometer (with unnecessary prefix).

dechristianize (dē-kris'ti-an-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. dechristianized, ppr. dechristianizing. [= F. déchristianiser; as de-priv. + christianiser.] To turn from Christianity; banish Christian belief and principles from; paganize. Also spelled dechristianise.

deci- [Short for decim-, < L. decimus, tenth: see decimal.] An element, meaning 'tenth', in the nomenclature of the metric system, as in decimeter, the tenth of a meter, decigram, the tenth of a gram, etc.

deciare (des-ī-ār), n. [< F. déciare, < L. decimus, tenth, + F. are, are: see are.] In the metric system, a unit of superficial measure, the tenth part of an are, or 107.6 square feet, English measure.

decidable (dē-si'dā-bl), a. [< decide + -able.] That may be decided.

decide (dē-sid'), v.; pret. and pp. decided, ppr. deciding. [< ME. deciden, < OF. decider, F. décider = Sp. Pg. decidir = It. decidere, < L. deciderē, decide, also lit. cut off, < de- off, + cadere, cut. Cf. decise, and concise, incise, etc.] 1. trans. 1. To cut off; separate.

Our seat denies us traffick here;
The sea, too near, decides us from the rest.
Fuller, Holy State, II. 20.

2. To determine, as a question, controversy, or struggle, by some mode of arbitrament; settle by giving the victory to one side or the other; determine the issue or result of; adjust; conclude; end: as, the court decided the case in favor of the plaintiff; the umpire decided the contest; the fate of the bill is decided.

The quarrel toucheth none but us alone;
Betwixt ourselves let us decide it then.
Shak., i Hen. VI., iv. 1.

They [the Greeks] were the first . . . to decide questions of war and policy by the free vote of the people fairly taken.
E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 262.

They fought with unabated ardour; and the victory was only decided by their almost total extermination.

H. W. Dawson, Hist. Church of Eng., xv.

3. To resolve; determine in the mind: as, he decided to go.

Who decided
What our gifts, and what our wants should be?
M. Arnold, Self-Deception.

II. intrans. To determine; form a definite opinion; come to a conclusion; pronounce a judgment: as, the court decided in favor of the defendant; to decide upon one's course.

Who shall decide when doctors disagree?
Pope, Moral Essays, III. 1.

Shall I wait a day ere I decide
On doing or not doing justice here?
Browning, King and Book, I. 17.

decided (dē-si'ded), a. [< F. décidé = Sp. Pg. decidido, pp., used in the same way.] 1. Free from ambiguity or uncertainty; unmistakable; unquestionable: as, a decided improvement.

I find much cause to reproach myself that I have lived so long, and have given no decided and public proofs of my being a Christian.
P. Henry, in Wirt's Sketches.

2. Resolute; determined; free from hesitation or wavering: as, a decided character.

A politic caution, a guarded circumspection, were among the ruling principles of our forefathers in their most decided conduct.

= Syn. 1. Decided, Decisive, indisputable, undeniable, certain, positive, absolute. Decided and decisive are sometimes confounded, but are distinct, decided being passive and decisive active. A decided victory is a real, unmistakable victory; a decisive victory is one that decides the issue of the campaign. The battle of Bull Run ended in a decided victory, but not a decisive one; the victory at Waterloo was both decided and decisive. Compare a decided answer with a decisive one. The difference is the same as between definite and definitive. See definitive.

He had marked preferences, and . . . his opinions were as decided as his prejudices.
Edinburgh Rev.
The sentence of superior judges is final, decisive, and irrevocable.
Blackstone.

All the most eminent men . . . Hampden excepted, were inclined to half measures. They dreaded a decisive victory almost as much as a decisive overthrow.
Macleay, Hallam's Const. Hist.

3. Unhesitating. decidedly (dē-si'ded-ly), adv. In a decided or determined manner; clearly; indisputably; in a manner to preclude doubt.

While tasting something decidedly bitter, sweetness cannot be thought of.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 22.

decidedness (dē-sī'ded-nēs), n. The state of being decided.

decidedly (dē-sī'ding-li), adv. [decide + -ment.] The act of deciding; decision.

Fig. signifier 'there be times, and terms of honour To argue three things in, decidedness able To speak to noble gentlemen, ways put out And to the life of itself, you're too rugged.

Fletcher (and another), Love's Pilgrimage, li 1 deciduous (dē-sī'dū-ŭs), n. [L. deciduus (t), pp. of decidere, fall off, fall down, < de- + cadere, fall: see cadence and decay.] A falling off.

Men observing the deciduous of the thorn do fall upon the conceit that it annually rotteth away, and successively reneweth again.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err.

decider (dē-sī'dēr), n. One who decides; one who or that which determines a cause or contest.

I dare not take upon me to be umpire and decider of those many alterations among chronologies.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 71.

decidingly (dē-sī'ding-li), adv. In a deciding manner; decisively.

But Herodotus who wrote his (Homer's) life hath cleared this point . . . and so decidingly concludeth, etc.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., vii 12.

decidua (dē-sī'dū-ŭ), n. [NL. sc. membrana, the membrane that falls off, fem. of L. deciduus, that falls down: see deciduous.] In physiol., a membrane arising from alteration of the upper layer of the mucous membrane of the uterus, after the reception into the latter of the impregnated ovum, the name being given to it because it is discharged at parturition. At an early stage of the development of the human ovum the decidua exhibits a threefold division: a layer immediately lining the uterine cavity, called the decidua vera (true decidua); a second layer, immediately investing the embryo, called the decidua reflexa (turned back decidua); and a third layer, or rather a special development of part of the decidua vera, called the decidua serotina (late decidua).

decidual (dē-sī'dū-ŭl), a. [decidua + -al.] Of or pertaining to the decidua.

deciduarius (dē-sī'dū-ŭ-ŕ-i), a. [L. deciduus (see deciduous) + E. -ary.] Falling off; dropping away; deciduous. [Rare.]

The shedding of the deciduarius margins may be compared with the shedding by very young birds of their down.

Darwin, Descent of Man, li 77.

Deciduata (dē-sī'dū-ŭ-ŕ-ŭ), n. pl. [NL. neut. pl. of deciduatus: see deciduatus.] One of the two major divisions (the other being Non-deciduata) into which monodelphous mammals have been divided. See the extract.

In the Deciduata . . . the superficial layer of the mucous membrane of the uterus undergoes a special modification, and unites . . . with the villi developed from the chorion of the fetus, and, at birth, this decidua and maternal part of the placenta is thrown off along with the fetus, the mucous membrane of the uterus . . . being regenerated during, and after, each pregnancy.

Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 222.

deciduate (dē-sī'dū-ŭ-ŕ-ŭ), a. [NL. deciduatus, having a decidua, < decidua, a decidua: see decidua.] 1. Having a decidua or a deciduous placenta; pertaining to or having the characters of the Deciduata.—2. Being deciduous, as a placenta.

deciduity (dē-sī'dū-ŭ-ŕ-i-ŭ), n. [deciduatus + -ity.] Deciduousness. [Rare.]

deciduus (dē-sī'dū-ŭ-s), a. [F. decider = Sp. deciduo, < L. deciduus, that falls down, < de- + cadere, fall down, < de- down, + cadere, fall: see decay.] Falling off or liable to fall, especially after a definite period of time; not perennial or permanent.

There is much that is deciduus in books, but all that gives them a title to rank as literature in the highest sense is perennial.

Lovell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 177.

Deciduous institutions imply deciduous sentiments.

H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 468.

Specifically.—(a) In bot. (1) Falling off at maturity or at the end of the season, as petals, leaves, fruit, etc.: in distinction from succulent or caducous organs, which fall soon after their appearance, and from perennial or permanent, or, as applied to leaves, from evergreen. (2) Losing the foliage every year: as, deciduous trees. (b) In zool.: (1) Falling off at a certain stage of an animal's existence, as the hair, horns, and teeth of certain animals. (2) Losing certain parts regularly and periodically, or at certain stages or ages: as, a deciduous insect.—Deciduous cups or pieces of the mandibles, in entom., appendages, one on the outer side or end of each mandible, which are generally lost soon after the insect attains the imago stage, leaving scars. They are found in a single family of rhynchophorous Coleoptera, the Stenopneustidae.—Deciduous dentition, the dentition.—Deciduous insects, those insects that cast off their wings after copulation, as the females of ants and termites.—Deciduous membrane, See decidua.

deciduousness (dē-sī'dū-ŭ-s-nēs), n. The quality of being deciduous.

decigram, decigramme (des-i'-gram), n. [F. decigramme = Sp. decigrammo = Pg. decigrammo = It. decigramma, < L. decim(mus), tenth, + NL. gramma, gram.] In the metric system, a weight of one tenth of a gram, equal to 1.54 grains troy.

decil, decile (des'il), n. [F. déci = It. decile, irreg. < L. decimus, tenth, < decem = E. ten.] An aspect or position of two planets when they are a tenth part of the zodiac (36°) distant from each other.

deciliter, decilitre (des-i'-lĕ-tĕr), n. [F. décilitre = Sp. decilitro = Pg. It. decilitro, < L. decimus, tenth, + NL. litra, liter: see liter.] In the metric system, a measure of capacity equal to one tenth of a liter, or 3.52 English fluidounces, or 3.88 United States fluidounces.

decillion (dē-sī'lĭ-ŭn), n. [Irreg. < L. decem, ten, + E. (m)illion.] 1. According to English notation, a million involved to the tenth power, being a unit with sixty ciphers annexed.—2. According to the modern French notation, which is also used in the United States, a thousand involved to the eleventh power, being a unit with thirty-three ciphers annexed. (Owing to the ambiguity resulting from the partial adoption of the second meaning, this and similar words (except million) are practically disused.)

decillionth (dē-sī'lĭ-ŭnth), a. and n. [decillion + -th.] 1. a. Pertaining to a decillion; having the magnitude or position of one of a decillion equal parts.

II. n. The quotient of unity divided by a decillion; one of a decillion equal parts.

decima (des-i'-mā), n.; pl. decimæ (-mĕ). [L. decima, tenth: see decimate.] 1. In music: (a) An interval of ten diatonic degrees, being an octave and a third. (b) An organ-stop whose pipes sound a tenth above the keys struck.—2. A Spanish money: the tenth of a real vellon, or about 5 cents in United States money.

decimal (des-i'-mal), a. and n. [OF. decimal, F. décimal = Sp. Pg. decimal = It. decimale = D. decimal = G. Dan. Sw. decimal, < ML. decimālis, < L. decimus, tenth, < decem = E. ten: see ten.] 1. a. 1. Pertaining to the tenth or to tens; proceeding by tens.—2. Relating to tithes.

Regulating the jurisdiction of Ecclesiastical Courts in causes testamentary, decimal, and matrimonial.

Heflin, Hist. Presbyterianism, p. 428.

Decimal arithmetic, the ordinary method of arithmetical calculation by the Arabic notation. The term is sometimes restricted to the calculation with decimals.—Decimal currency. See currency.—Decimal fraction, a fraction whose denominator is a power of 10. So long as the quantity is conceived as having a power of 10 for its denominator it is properly and usually called a decimal fraction, however it may be written. The ordinary method of writing it is by prefixing to the numerator (used alone) a dot (the decimal point) with a number of zeros sufficient to make the number of places in the numerator equal to that in the denominator, less one. Thus,  $\frac{1}{10} = .1$ ,  $\frac{1}{100} = .01$ , etc.;  $\frac{2}{10} = .2$ , etc.;  $\frac{2}{100} = .02$ , etc.

Decimal measure, any measure belonging to a decimal system.—Decimal notation, a system of writing numbers depending on powers of 10, especially the ordinary system by means of nine digits and a cipher. The system in an imperfect form, wanting the 0 (the places being preserved by ruled columns), is believed to have been invented in India, and is explained in the Latin geometry of Boethius (died about A. D. 525). The genuineness both of the passage and of the entire work has been much disputed, but is now more usually conceded. The system was, however, entirely disused in Europe until having been completed by the invention of the 0 (the 10th digit) through the Arabians (by whom it is called the indian notation), being first systematically explained in the work of Leonardo da Pisa, about 1200. The extension of the system to fractions was accomplished much later. See II.—Decimal numeration, any system of naming numbers by taking them in multiples and powers of 10. Such systems have generally prevailed in all languages, being founded on the use of the ten fingers as helps to count.

Decimal place, the position of a figure in decimal notation.—Decimal point, a dot separating the whole part from the fractional part of an expression in decimal notation. The decimal point appears to have been first used by Napier (Constructio, 1619); the writing of it above the line by Newton. See II.—Decimal system, any system of measurement or of counting whose units are powers of 10; especially, the metric system (which see, under metric).

II. n. An expression denoting a decimal fraction by an extension of the decimal notation. A dot, called the decimal point, being placed to the right of the units' place, figures are written to the right of it, the first place in passing to the right being appropriated to tenths, the second to hundredths, etc. Thus, 1932.3 is the same as 19320.3; 1932.03 is the same as 19320.3; and 1.93203 is the same as 19320.3. (See decimal fraction, above.) The invention of decimals is usually attributed to Stevinus (1585). In his notation a mixed number, for example 1932.3, which is now written 1932.303, would have been written 19320303030303. The decimal point may be placed above the line (a common practice) or on the line.—Recurring decimal, a decimal in which after a certain point the digits are continually repeated. If there is but one recurring figure, the expression is called a repeating decimal; if there are more than one, the expression is called a circulating decimal. But these decimals are not commonly observed with strictness. A circulating decimal is denoted by means of dots over the first and last figures of the recurring period. Thus,  $\frac{1}{3}$  is 0.333, that is, 0.33333333, etc.

decimalism (des-i'-mal-izm), n. [decimal + -ism.] The theory or system of a decimal notation or division, as of numbers, currency, weights, etc.

decimalist (des-i'-mal-ist), n. [decimal + -ist.] One who employs or advocates computation or numeration by tens.

Of course all these fifteens and sixties were objectionable to the pure decimalist.

The Engineer, LXV. 22.

decimalization (des-i'-mal-i-zā'-shn), n. The act of reducing or causing to conform to the decimal system.

When the decimalization of English money was first proposed, the notion of international money had never been seriously entertained, and hardly indeed conceived.

Jeans, Money and Mech. of Exchange, p. 178.

decimalise (des-i'-mal-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. decimalised, ppr. decimalising. [decimal + -ise.] To reduce to the decimal system: as, to decimalise currency, weights, measures, etc.

decimally (des-i'-mal-i), adv. By tens; by means of decimals.

decimate (des-i'-māt), v. t.; pret. and pp. decimated, ppr. decimating. [L. decimatus, pp. of decimare (> F. décimer = Sp. obs.) Pg. decimar = It. decimare = D. decimieren = G. decimiren = Dan. decimere = Sw. decimera], select the tenth by lot (for punishment), pay tithes, < decimus, tenth: see decimal.] 1. To take the tenth part of or from; to tithe.

I have heard you are as poor as a decimated Cavalier (referring to Cromwell's 10 per cent. income-tax on Cavaliers), and had not one foot of land in all the world.

2. To select by lot and put to death every tenth man of: as, to decimate a captured army or a body of prisoners or mutineers (a barbarity occasionally practised in antiquity).

(And sometimes decimates or tithes delinquent persons, and they die for a common crime, according as (the hath cast their lot in the decrees of predestination.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I 220.

3. Loosely, to destroy a great but indefinite number or proportion of: as, the inhabitants were decimated by fever; the troops were decimated by the enemy's fire.

It [England] had decimated itself for a question which involved no principle, and led to no result.

Froude, Hist. Eng.

decimation (des-i'-mā'-shn), n. [F. décomposition = Pg. decimacão = It. decimazione, < L. decimatio (n.), < decimare, decimate: see decimate.] 1. A titling; specifically, an income-tax of 10 per cent. levied on the Cavaliers by Cromwell.—2. A selection of every tenth by lot, as for punishment, etc.

By decimation, and a titheed death, . . . take thou the destin'd tenth.

Shak., T. of A., v. 5.

And the whole army had cause to enquire into their own millions, when they saw the Lord of Hosts, with a dreadful decimation, taking off so many of our brethren by the word of executioners.

C. Mather, Mag. Chris., v. 9.

3. The destruction of a great but indefinite number or proportion of people, as of an army or of the inhabitants of a country; a heavy loss of life.

decimator (des-i'-mā-tŕ), n. [F. décimateur = It. decimatore; as decimate + -or.] One who or that which decimates.

decime (dē-sĕm'), n. [F. décime, a tenth, tithe, decime (in older form disme, dime, > E. dime), < L. decimus, tenth: see decimal and dime.] A French coin, the tenth of a franc, or about 2 United States cents.

decimestrial (des-i'-mes'tri-ŭl), a. [L. decem, = E. ten, + -estrie, adj. form in comp. of mensis, a month, q. v. Cf. semestrial.] Consisting of or containing ten months. [Rare.]

The decimestrial year still survived long after regal governments had ceased.

W. Smith, Dict. Greek and Rom. Antiq., p. 122.

decimeter (des-i'-mĕ-tĕr), n. [F. décimètre (> Sp. decímetro = Pg. decímetro), < L. decimus, tenth, + F. mètre = E. meter.] In the metric system, a measure of length equal to the tenth part of a meter, or 3.937 inches. A square decimeter is equal to 15.5 square inches, and a decimeter cube, or liter, is 61 cubic inches, equal to 0.88 imperial quart or 1.056 United States (wine) quart.

decimo (des-i'-mō; Sp. pron. dĕs'ĭ-mō), n. [Sp., < L. decimus, tenth: see decimal.] In Spanish reckoning: (a) The tenth part of a peso or dollar. (b) The tenth part of an oncia or ounce.

States the holer-deck is the deck on which the boilers are carried. A covered deck is a deck arched so as to be higher in the middle than at the stem or stern—the opposite of the usual practice.

I boarded the king's ship: now on the beach,
Now in the want, the deck, in every cabin,
I flam'd amazement. Shak., Tempest, I. 2.

3. In winning, the platform of the cage; that part of the cage on which the cars stand or the men ride. Cages are sometimes built with as many as four decks.—4. A pile of things laid one upon another; a heap; a store; a file, as of cards or papers.

And for a song I have
A paper-blurrier, who, on all occasions,
For all times and all seasons, hath such trinkets Ready in the deck. Messenger, Guardian, III. 3.

5. A pack of cards containing only those necessary to play any given game: as, a euchre deck; a bezique deck.

Well, if I chance but once to get the deck,
To deal about and shuffle as I would.
Solimus, Emperor of the Turks (1635).

6. That part of a pack which remains after the deal, and from which cards may be drawn during the course of the game.

Whiles he thought to steal the single ten,
The king was stily finger'd from the deck.
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., v. 1.

Deck (dek), n. A pack of cards assorted or arranged in a known way. [Gambler's slang.]—Deck (dek), n. See officer.—On deck, on hand; ready for action or duty; hence, in board, next at the bat; having the right or privilege of batting next.—Protective deck, in a warship, a steel deck several inches in maximum thickness, extending throughout the length of the ship below the water-line.—To clear the decks, to prepare a ship of war for action.—To sweep the deck or the decks, (a) To dash violently over or along the deck of a vessel, as a great wave or the fire of an enemy's guns, carrying everything before it. (b) To command every part of the deck, as with small arms, from the tops of an attacking vessel. (c) To take off or carry away all the stakes on a card-table; hence, generally, to gain everything.

Deck-beam (dek'bēm), n. A strong transverse beam of timber or iron stretching across a ship from side to side, in order to support the deck and retain the sides at their proper distance.

Deck-bridge (dek'brij), n. A bridge in which the roadway is laid upon the top of the truss: opposed to bottom-road or through bridge. Also called top-road bridge.

Deck-cargo (dek'kār'gō), n. Cargo stowed on the deck of a vessel; a deck-load.

Deck-cleat (dek'klēt), n. A cleat fastened to a deck.

Deck-collar (dek'kol'ār), n. The collar or ring which lines the hole in the roof of a railroad-car, through which the stove-pipe passes.

Decked (dek't), p. a. 1. Dressed; adorned.—2. Furnished with a deck or decks: as, a three-decked ship.—3. In her, edged or purged with another color: thus, the feathers of a bird of one tincture are decked of another tincture.

Also marguetté.
Deckal, n. See deckle.

Decker (dek'er), n. [= D. dekker (tafeldekker, driedekker) = G. dekker = Dan. dekker (in comp. tafeldekker, treddekker) = Sw. täckare; as deck + -er. Cf. thatcher.] 1. One who or that which decks or adorns; a coverer; as, a table-decker.—2. A vessel that has a deck or decks: as, a two-decker. [Only in composition.]

Deck-feather (dek'fēw'er), n. See feather.

Deck-flat (dek'flat), n. See flat.

Deck-hand (dek'hænd), n. A person regularly employed as a laborer on the deck of a vessel.

Deck-head (dek'hed), n. A slipper limpet, or species of Crepidula.

Deck-hook (dek'hūk), n. A heavy knee-shaped timber in the extreme end of a ship, either bow or stern, serving to support the deck and to strengthen the frame. See cut under stem.

Deck-house (dek'hous), n. A small house erected on the deck of a ship for any purpose.

Decking (dek'ing), n. 1. The act of adorning.—2. Ornament; embellishment.

Such glorious deckings of the temple.
Homilies, II., Against Idolatry.

No decking sets forth anything so much as affection.
Sir P. Sidney.

Deckle (dek'l), n. [Also written dekke, deckel; = Sw. deckel = Russ. dekele, < LG. dekel = G. dekel (cf. D. dekel = Dan. dekel), a cover, lid, tympan, dim. of deke, cover, covering, dek, deck: see deck.] In paper-making: (a) In hand paper-making, a rectangular frame laid upon the wire mold on which the paper-pulp is placed, to confine it within the limits of the required size of sheet; in machine paper-making, a belt of linen and scotchouse placed on either side of the apron, to keep the pulp from spreading out laterally and making the paper wider than is desired. (b) The rough or raw edge of paper; specifically, the ragged edge of handmade paper, produced by the deckle.

Deckle-edged (dek'l-ējd), a. See the extract.

Deckle-edged. This term has lately been adopted in the advertisements of books to indicate that the edges of the paper have not been cut or trimmed, so that it is equivalent to the more common designation, "rough-edged."

N. and Q., 7th ser., v. 237.

Deckle-strap (dek'l-strap), n. A strap used on paper-making machines to confine the flow of the pulp and to determine the width of the sheet.

Deck-load (dek'lōd), n. Same as deck-cargo.

Deck-passage (dek'pas'ij), n. Conveyance of a passenger on the deck of a vessel.

Deck-passenger (dek'pas'gn-jēr), n. A passenger who pays for accommodation on the deck of a vessel.

Deck-pipe (dek'pīp), n. An iron pipe through which the chain-cable is paid into the chain-locker.

Deck-planking (dek'plang'king), n. Planking cut suitably for forming the deck of a vessel.

Deck-plate (dek'plāt), n. A metallic plate placed about the smoke-stack or the furnace of a marine engine, to protect the wood of the deck.

Deck-pump (dek'pūmp), n. A hand-pump used for washing decks.

Deck-sheet (dek'shēt), n. The sheet of a studding-sail leading directly to the deck, by which it is steadied until set.

Deck-stopper (dek'stop'er), n. A strong stopper used for securing the cable.

Deck-tackle (dek'tak'l), n. A heavy tackle used for hauling in cable, or for other purposes.

Deck-transom (dek'trans'um), n. See transom.

Decl. An abbreviation of declension.

Declaim (dē-klām'), v. [ME. declamen = OF. declamer, F. déclamer (> D. declameren = G. declamieren = Dan. deklamere = Sw. deklamera) = Sp. Pg. declamar = It. declamare, < L. declamare, cry aloud, make a speech, < de- (intensive) + clamare, cry, shout: see claim, clamor.] I. intrans. 1. To make a formal speech or oration; harangue.

With what impatience he declaim'd!
Swift, Death of Dr. Swift.

It is usual for masters to make their boys declaim on both sides of the argument. Swift.

To declaim on the temporal advantages . . . [the poor] enjoy, is only repeating what none either believe or practice. Goldsmith, Vicar, xxix.

2. To speak or write for rhetorical effect; speak or write pompously or elaborately, without earnestness of purpose, sincerity, or sound argument; rant.

It is not enough in general to declaim against our sins, but we must search out particularly those predominant vices which by their boldness and frequency have provoked God thus to punish us. Stillington, Sermons, I. 1.

The Rogue has (with all the Wit he could muster up) been declaiming against Wit.

Congress, Love for Love, I. 2.

At least he [Milton] does not declaim. J. A. St. John.

The preacher declaimed most furiously, for an hour, against luxury, although . . . there were not three pairs of shoes in the whole congregation.

R. Cheate, Addresses, p. 21.

3. To repeat a select piece of prose or poetry in public, as an exercise in oratory or to exhibit skill in elocution.

The undergraduates shall in their course declaim publicly in the hall, in one of the three learned languages.

Laws of Harvard Univ. (1784), in Petros's Hist. Harv. Univ., App., p. 129.

II. trans. 1. To utter or deliver in public in a rhetorical or oratorical manner.—2. To speak as an exercise in elocution: as, he declaimed Mark Antony's speech.—3. To maintain or advocate oratorically.

Makes himself the devil's orator, and declaims his cause. Bosch, Sermons, VIII. 82.

4. To speak against; cry down; decry.

This banquet then . . . is at once declared and declaimed, spoken of and forbidden.

Rev. F. Adams, Works, I. 178.

Declamant (dē-klā'mant), n. [declaim + -ant, after L. declamant (-e), ppr. of declamare, declaim: see declaim.] Same as declaimer. [Rare.]

Declaimer (dē-klā'mēr), n. One who declaims; one who speaks for rhetorical effect or as an exercise in elocution; one who attempts to convince by a harangue.

Lord declaimers on the part Of liberty, themselves the slaves of last. Cooper.

I have little sympathy with declaimers about the Pilgrim Fathers, who look upon them all as men of grand conceptions and superhuman foresight.

Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 288.

Declamando (dek-lā-man'dō), [It. ppr. of declamare, < L. declamare, declaim: see declaim.]

In music, in a declamatory style. E. D.

Declamation (dek-lā-mā'shon), n. [= D. declamatio = G. declamation = Dan. Sw. declamation, < F. déclamation = Sp. declamación = Pg. declamação = It. declamazione, < L. declamatio (-n-), < declamare, declaim: see declaim.]

1. The act or art of declaiming or making rhetorical harangues in public; especially, the delivery of a speech or an exercise in oratory or elocution, as by a student of a college, etc.: as, a public declamation; the art of declamation.

The public listened with little emotion . . . to five acts of monotonous declamation.

Macaulay.

Then crush'd by rules and weaken'd as refin'd,
For years the power of tragedy declin'd;
From hard to hard the rigid caution crept
Till declamation roar'd, while passion slept.

Johnson, Drury Lane, Prol.

Specifically—2. In vocal music, the proper rhetorical enunciation of the words, especially in recitative and in dramatic music.—3. A public harangue or set speech; an oration.

The declamations of the pulpit described the sufferings of the saved souls in purgatory as incurably greater than were endured by the most wretched mortals upon earth.

Lecty, Europ. Murals, II. 247.

4. Pompous, high-sounding verbiage in speech or writing; stilted oratory.

Many of the finest passages in his [Milton's] controversial writings are sometimes spoken of, even by favourable judges, as declamation.

J. A. St. John.

Loose declamation may deceive the crowd

Stow, Advice to a Young Lawyer.

Declamator (dek-lā-mā-tōr), n. [= F. déclamateur = Sp. Pg. declamador = It. declamatore, < L. declamator, < declamare, declaim.] A declaimer.

Who could, I say, hear this generous declamator without being fir'd at his noble zeal? Steele, Tatler, No. 58.

Declamatory (dē-klām'ā-tō-rī), a. [= F. déclamatoire = Sp. Pg. It. declamatorio, < L. declamatorius, declamatory, < declamare, declaim: see declaim.] 1. Pertaining to the practice of declaiming in oratory or music; having the character of declamation.

The public will enter no protest if the gaps between them are filled up with the declamatory odds and ends, provided something on the stage be more or less occupying their attention.

Wagner and Wagnerism, Nineteenth Century, March, 1883.

2. Merely rhetorical; stilted; straining after effect: as, a declamatory style.

That perfection of tone which can be eloquent without being declamatory. Lowell, New Princeton Rev., I. 155.

Declarable (dē-klār'ā-bəl), a. [= F. déclarable, < declare + -able.] Capable of being declared or proved.

What slender opinions the ancients held of the efficacy of this star is declarable from their compute.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iv. 12.

Declarant (dē-klār'ant), n. [F. déclarant, < L. declarans (-e), ppr. of declarare: see declare.] One who makes a declaration; specifically, in law, one whose admission or statement, made in writing or orally at some former time, is sought to be offered in evidence. Such declarations, even though made by a stranger to the litigation, are received in several classes of cases: as, for instance, to prove a fact of pedigree, or when made in the course of duty by a person since deceased, or against the interest of the declarant.

The acknowledgment of payment was held to be "against the declarant's interest," and rendered the whole statement admissible.

Bowe, Br., VII. 761.

Declaration (dek-lā-rā'shon), n. [ME. declaracion = D. declaratio = G. declaration = Dan. declaration, < OF. déclaration, F. déclaration = Sp. declaración = Pg. declaração = It. dichiarazione, < L. declaratio (-n-), a declaration, < declarare, declare: see declare.] 1. A clearing up; that which makes plain; explanation.

Of this forswide shale, fro the cross-tyne vnto the verre angle, is elaped vmbra verba, and the nother parte is elaped the vmbra recta. And for the more declaration, loo here the figure.

Chaucer.

2. A positive or formal statement in regard to anything; affirmation; explicit assertion; avowal; publication; proclamation.

His promises are nothing else but declarations what God will do for the good of man.

Meador, Boston. Feby.

To set forth in order a declaration of those things which are most surely believed among us. Acts i. 1.

8. That which is proclaimed or declared; specifically, the document or instrument by which an announcement or assertion is formally made: as, the Declaration of Independence.

Verde I wold the declaration.

Rom. of Partney (R. E. T. A.), l. 1002.

4. In law: (a) At common law, the pleading in which the plaintiff formally presents the allegations on which he bases his claim for relief in a civil action: now more commonly called complaint. (b) In the criminal law of Scotland, the account which a prisoner who has been apprehended on suspicion of having committed a crime gives of himself, to be taken down in writing, on his examination.—5. A confession of faith or doctrine: as, the Auburn Declaration; the Savoy Declaration, etc.—Declaration de nullité, in French law, an adjudication in bankruptcy.—Declaration of Independence, in U. S. hist., the public declaration by which the Continental Congress, on July 4th, 1776, declared the colonies to be free and independent of Great Britain: often called by emise the Declaration.—Declaration of intention, in law, a declaration made in court by an alien of his intent to become a citizen of the United States: required in some States as a condition of acquiring land.—Declaration of rights, an English statute of 1802 providing means to establish and quiet land titles.—Declaration of trust, an avowal of holding specified property in trust for another person.—Declaration of war, an announcement or proclamation of war by the sovereign authority of a country against another country. It was formerly customary to send a declaration of warlike purpose to the menaced power before beginning hostilities; but a declaration of war is now more commonly merely an announcement of the actual existence of a state of war. In most countries the power of declaring or formally beginning war rests with the sovereign or executive, but the Constitution of the United States confides this power to Congress.—Dying declaration, in law, a declaration made by a person on his death-bed. Such declarations, when relating to the cause of death, are admitted as evidence in a prosecution for homicide where it can be proved that the declarant knew he was about to die and had given up all hope of recovery.—Explicit declaration, See explicit.—Judicial declaration, in Scots law, in civil cases, the statement taken down in writing of a party when judicially examined as to the particular facts on which a case rests.—Savoy Declaration, a "declaration of the faith and order owned and practised in the Congregational churches in England," agreed upon at a meeting in the Savoy palace, London, in 1658. Doctrinally, it is a modification of the Westminster Assembly's Confession of Faith. It is no longer regarded as authoritative among the churches of the Congregational faith and order. Also called Savoy Confession.—To emit a declaration. See emit.

declaratif (dē-klar'ə-tiv), a. [= F. déclaratif = Sp. Pg. declarativo = It. dichiarativo, < L.L. declarativus, < L. declarare, declare: see declare.] 1. Making declaration, proclamation, or publication; exhibiting or manifesting; declaratory; explanatory.

We but rarely find examples of this imperfect subjunctive in the independent declaratif form.

Amer Jour. Philol., VIII. 82.

8. As declared, set forth, or made known: in contrast to essential: as, the declarative glory of God.

declaratively (dē-klar'ə-tiv-ly), adv. In a declarative manner; by distinct assertion, and not impliedly; by proclamation.

Christ was not primarily but declaratively invested with all power in heaven and on earth after he had finished his work and risen from the dead.

Bibliotheca Sacra, XLV. 602.

declarator (dē-klar'ə-tor), n. [F. déclaratoire, < L. as if **declaratorius*, declaratory: see declaratory.] In Scots law, a declaratory action; a form of action in the Court of Session, the object of which is to have a fact declared judicially, leaving the legal consequences of it to follow as a matter of course: as, a declarator of marriage, etc.—Declarator of bastardy. See bastardy.

declaratorily (dē-klar'ə-tō-rē-ly), adv. By declaration or exhibition.

Andreas Alestus, the civilian, and Franciscus de Cordua, have both declaratorily confirmed the same.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err.

declaratory (dē-klar'ə-tō-rē), a. [= F. déclaratoire = Sp. Pg. It. declaratorio, < L. as if **declaratorius*, < declarator, a declarer, < declarare, declare: see declare.] Making declaration, clear manifestation, or exhibition; affirmative; declarative.

This [not] is of a declaratory nature, and recites that they are already contrary to the ancient and feudal laws of the realm.

Halleson, Const. Hist., vi.

Declaratory act or statute, an act or statute recited not to make new law, but to put an end to doubt by restating or explaining some former act or common-law rule.—Declaratory action, in Scots law, same as declarator.—Declaratory decree or judgment, a decree or judgment which simply declares the rights of the parties or expresses the opinion of the court on a question of law, without ordering anything to be done. Replejo and Locus.

declare (dē-klar'), v.; pret. and pp. declared, ppr. declaring. [F. déclarer, < OF. declarer, declorier, declorier, etc., = F. déclarer = Sp. Pg. declarar = It. dichiarare, dichiarare, < L. declarare, make clear, manifest, show, declare, < de + clarus, clear: see clear, clarify.] I. trans. 1. To make clear; clear up; free from obscurity; make plain.

To declare this a little, we must assume that the surfaces of such bodies are exactly smooth.

Boyle.

2. To make known by words; assert explicitly; manifest or communicate plainly in any way; publish; proclaim; tell.

For a story of gallant bold Robin Hood

Unto you I will declare.

Robin Hood and the Shepherd (Child's Ballads, V. 236)

The heavens declare the glory of God. Ps. xix. 1

I will declare what he hath done for my soul. Ps. lxxvi. 16

Who shall then declare

The date of thy deep-founded strength?

Bryant, The Ages, lxxv.

3. To proclaim; announce.

I return'd in the evening with Sir Joseph Williamson, now declared Secretary of State.

Swetyn, Diary, July 22, 1674

4. To assert; affirm: as, he declares the story to be false.

He says some of the best things in the world -- and declares that wit is his aversion.

Lamb, My Relations.

5. In law, to solemnly assert a fact before witnesses: as, he declared a paper signed by him to be his last will and testament.—6. To make a full statement of, as of goods on which duty is to be paid at the custom-house.

A merchant of that guild cannot declare at the custom-house merchandise brought in one ship-load or land conveyance of higher value than £3000.

Brougham

To declare a dividend. See dividend.—To declare one's self, to throw off reserve and avow one's opinions, show openly what one thinks, or which side one espouses.

We are a considerable body, who, upon a proper occasion, would not fail to declare ourselves.

Addison

To declare war, to make a declaration of war (which see, under declaration) = SYN. 2-4. Proclaim, Publish, etc. (see announce). Afirm, Avow, etc. (see assert); state, protest, utter, promulgate.

II. intrans. 1. To make known one's thoughts or opinions; proclaim or avow some opinion, purpose, or resolution in favor or in opposition; make known explicitly some determination; make a declaration; come out: with for or against: as, the prince declared for the allies; victory had not declared for either party; the allied powers declared against France.

The internal faculties of will and understanding detecting and declaring against them

Jer. Taylor.

Like fawning courtiers, for success they wait;

And then come smiling, and declare for fate.

Dryden

Specifically.—2. To express a formal decision; make a decision known by official proclamation or notice.

The Office did attend the King and Cabal, to discourse of the further quantity of victuals fit to be declared for, which was 2000 men for six months.

Peypa, Diary, IV. 144

3. In law, to make a declaration or complaint; set forth formally in pleading the cause for relief against the defendant: as, the plaintiff declared on a promissory note.—4. In the game of bezique, to lay on the table, face up, any counting-cards or combinations of cards; show cards for the purpose of scoring.—To declare off, (a) To refuse to cooperate in any undertaking; break off one's engagements, etc. (b) To decide against continuing a habit or practice; break away from a custom: as, to declare off from smoking. [Colloq.]

declared (dē-klar'), p. a. Avowed; proclaimed; open; professed: as, a declared enemy.

declaredly (dē-klar'ed-ly), adv. Avowedly; openly; explicitly.

The French were, from the very first, most declaredly averse from treating.

Sir Wm. Temple, Memoirs

declaredness (dē-klar'ed-ness), n. The state of being declared.

declarament (dē-klar'ment), n. [OF. declarament, declairament = Sp. declaramento = Pg. declarmento = It. dichiaramento, < ML. as if **declaramentum*, < L. declarare, declare: see declare.] A declaration.

A declarament of very different parts.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., i. 1

declarer (dē-klar'ēr), n. One who makes known, proclaims, or publishes; one who or that which exhibits or explains.

An open declarer of God's goodness.

J. Udall, On Lake xviii.

The declarer of some true facts or sincere passions.

Rushin, Lectures on Art.

declasé (dē-kla-sé'), a. [F.: see declassified.] Same as declassified.

It is only the declasé, the ne or do well, or the really unfortunate, who has nothing to call his own.

Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLIII. 227.

declasé (dē-kla-sé'), a. [de + class + -é, after F. déclassé (also used in E. as a noun).] Fallen or put out of one's proper class or place or any definite and recognized position or rank in the social system: applied to persons who by misfortune or their own fault have lost social or business standing, and are not counted as part of any recognized class of society.

declension (dē-klen'shon), n. [An accom. form (term. after extension, etc.) of OF. déclinaison (F. déclinaison), the same word as declination, declinatio, F. déclination, E. declination, < L. declinatio (n-), a bending aside, inflection, declension, < declinare, bend, decline: see decline and declination.] 1. A sloping downward; a declination; a descent; a slope; a declivity.

The declension of the land from that place to the sea.

T. Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

2. A sinking or falling into a lower or inferior state; deterioration; decline.

In the latter date and declension of his drooping years.

South, Sermons.

We never read that Jesus laughed, and but once that he rejoiced in spirit; but the declensions of our natures cannot bear the weight of a perpetual grave deportment.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1855), I. 24.

States and empires have their periods of declension.

Sterne, Sentimental Journey, p. 70.

But the fall, the rapid and total declension, of Wilkes's fame, the utter oblivion into which his very name has passed for all purposes save the remembrance of his vices, this affords also a salutary lesson to the followers of the multitude.

Brougham, John Wilkes.

3. Refusal; non-acceptance.

Declension is improperly used to signify the act of declining. It is a good word to express a state of decline or the process of decline. But we cannot say, "He sent in his declension of the office." . . . I do not find it (in this sense) in the works of the first class of English authors. We need a word to express the act in question; we have none but the participle "declining" . . . "Declination" may yet make its way into reputable use.

Philips, Eng. Style, p. 302.

4. In gram.: (a) The inflection of nouns, pronouns, and adjectives; strictly, the deviation of other forms of such a word from that of its nominative case; in general, the formation of the various cases from the stem, or from the nominative singular as representing it: thus, in English, man, man's, men, men's; in Latin, rex, regis, regi, regem, regis, in the singular, and reges, regum, regibus, in the plural. (b) The rehearsing of a word as declined; the act of declining a word, as a noun. (c) A class of nouns declined on the same type: as, first or second declension; the five Latin declensions. Abbreviated decl.—Declension of the needle. See declination.

declensional (dē-klen'shon-al), a. [declension + -al.] In gram., pertaining to or of the nature of declension.

It strenuously avoids the declensional and verbal pabulum usually administered to students.

Pop Sci Mo., XXX. 278.

declericalize (dē-kler'ē-kal-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. declericalized, ppr. declericalizing. [de + clerical + -ize.] To deprive of the clerical character; withdraw from clerical influence; secularize. [Rare.]

declinable (dē-kli'nā-bl), a. [= F. déclinable = Sp. declinable = Pg. declinavel = It. declinabile, < L.L. declinabilis, < declinare, decline: see decline.] Capable of being declined; specifically, in gram., capable of changing its termination in the oblique cases: as, a declinable noun.

In inflected languages, declinable words . . . usually have endings which not only determine their grammatical class and category, but are also characteristic of the language to which they belong.

G. P. Marsh, Lects. on Eng. Lang., vii.

declinal (dē-kli'nāl), a. [decline + -al.] 1. Bending downward; declining.—2. In geol., sloping from an axis, as strata of rocks. See declivity.

declinant (dē-kli'nant), a. [F. déclinant = Sp. Pg. It. declinante, < L. declinans (t-), ppr. of declinare, decline: see decline.] In her., having the tail hanging vertically downward: said of a serpent used as a bearing. Also declinast.

declinate (dek'il-nāt), a. [L. declinatus, pp. of declinare: see decline.] 1. In bot., bending or bent downward; declining: applied to stamens when they are thrown to one side of a flower, as in Amaryllis; also applied to mosses. Also declined and declinous.—2. In soil., declined; bending or sloping downward; declivous: opposed to acclinate.

declination (dek'il-nā'shon), n. [ME. declinacion, declinacioun = OF. declinacion, declinacion, declinason, F. déclinaison and declination = Sp. declinacion = Pg. declinaçāo = It. declinazione = D. declination = G. declination = Dan. Sw. deklination, < L. declinatio (n.), a bending aside, deflection, inflection, declension, < declinare, bend, decline: see decline. Cf. declension.] 1. A bending or sloping downward; a sloping or bending from a higher to a lower level; subsidence: as, the declination of the shore.

Like the sun in his evening declination.

Johnson, Rambler.

2. A falling to a lower or inferior condition; deterioration; decline: as, declination in or of vigor, virtue, morals, etc.

Your manhood and courage is always in increase; but our force groweth in declination.

J. Brende, tr. of Quintus Curtius, ix.

In our declinations now, every accident is accompanied with heavy clouds of melancholy; and in our youth we never admitted any.

Donne, Letters, ixix.

Many brave men, finding their fortune grow faint, and feeling its declination, have timely withdrawn themselves from great attempts. Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., ii. 10.

3. Deviation from a right line; oblique motion.

The declination of atoms in their descent. Bentley.

4. Deviation from the right path or course of conduct: as, a declination from duty.

The declinations from religion, besides the privative, which is atheism, and the branches thereof, are three: heresies, idolatry, and witchcraft.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii. 379.

5t. Aversion; disinclination.

The returns of sundry letters into France, signifying the queen's declination from marriage, and the people's unwillingness, to match that way.

Stow, Queen Elizabeth, an. 1581.

6. The act of declining, refusing, or shunning; refusal: as, a declination of an office. [U.S.]—7. In astron., the distance of a heavenly body from the celestial equator, measured on a great circle passing through the pole and also through the body. It is equal to the complement of the polar distance of the body, and is said to be north or south according as the body is north or south of the equator. Great circles passing through the poles, and cutting the equator at right angles, are called circles of declination. Small circles parallel to the celestial equator are termed parallels of declination.

He was that time in Gemini, as I came,

But litel to his declinations Of Cancer. Chaucer, Merchant's Tale, l. 979.

8. The angle between the magnetic meridian and the geographical meridian of a place.—9. In dialing, the arc of the horizon contained between the vertical plane and the prime vertical circle, if reckoned from east or west, or between the meridian and the plane, if reckoned from north or south.—10t. In gram., declension; the inflection of a noun through its various terminations.—Apparent declination. See apparent.—Declination of atoms, or declination of principles [ML. atomum principiorum], the slight uncaused swerving aside of atoms from their vertical paths, which was supposed by the ancient Epicureans for the sake of explaining free will and the variety of nature.—Declination of the compass or needle, or magnetic declination, the variation of the magnetic needle from the true meridian of a place. The amount of this variation is found by a declination needle or declinometer (which see). In the northeastern part of the United States the needle points west of north (about 8° W. at New York city in 1885), while in the southern and western portions it points east of north. Further, the declination is now westerly in Europe and Africa and over the Atlantic ocean, while it is easterly for the larger part of North America, South America, the Pacific ocean, and most of Asia. The declination is subject to large secular changes (30° to 60°), embracing a cycle of several centuries; it has been increasing in the eastern United States since the early part of the nineteenth century. See agnetic and isogonic.

declinational (dek'il-nā'shon-al), a. [declination + -al.] Of or pertaining to declination.—Declinational tide, a tide produced by the moon's changes of declination.

declinator (dek'il-nā'tor), n. [= F. déclinateur = Pg. declinator = It. declinatore, < NL. declinator, < L. declinare, decline: see decline and declination.] 1. An instrument used in ascertaining the declination, as in dialing, of a plane, and in astronomy, of the stars. Also declinator.—2t. One who declines to join or agree with another; a dissentient.

In surg., the removal of the head of the child in cases of difficult parturition.—Decollation of St. John the Baptist, a festival celebrated on the 29th day of August in both the Eastern and the Western Church, in memory of the decapitation of St. John the Baptist. It is entered under the same date in the calendar of the English prayer-book in the words, "St. John the Baptist, beheaded."

decollate (dē-kōl-āt), a. [< F., pp. of décoller, bare one's neck and shoulders, < dé, < L. de, off, down, + coll, col, < L. collum, neck.] (a) Low-necked: said of a dress-waist so shaped as to leave the neck and shoulders exposed. (b) [Fem. décollée.] By extension, having the neck and shoulders exposed: said of a woman the waist of whose dress is cut low in the neck.

decolor, decolour (dē-kul'gr), v. t. [= F. décolorer, < L. decolorare, deprive of color, < de, from, + color, color: see color, and cf. discolor.] To deprive of color; bleach.

The antiputrescent and decoloring properties of charcoal. Ure, Dict., I. 415.

decolorant (dē-kul'gr-ant), a. and s. [< L. decolorant(-s), ppr. of decolorare: see decolor.] 1. a. Having the property of removing color; bleaching.

Alcohol . . . is volatile, inflammable, and decolorant. Wilder and Gage, Anat. Tech., p. 112.

II. n. A substance which bleaches or removes color.

decolorate (dē-kul'gr-āt), v. t.; pret. and pp. decolorated, ppr. decolorating. [< L. decoloratus, pp. of decolorare, deprive of color: see decolor.] To deprive of color; decolor; bleach; blanch.

decoloratus (dē-kul'gr-āt), a. [< L. decoloratus, pp.: see the verb.] Deprived of color; bleached.

decoloration (dē-kul'gr-ā-shŏn), n. [= F. décoloration = Sp. decoloracion = Pg. decoloração, < L. decoloratio(-n), < decolorare, deprive of color: see decolor.] 1. The act or process of decoloring or depriving of color.—2. Absence of color; colorlessness.

Decoloration, a term . . . signifying bleaching or loss of the natural colour of any object. Hooper, Med. Dict.

decolorimeter (dē-kul'gr-im'e-tēr), n. [= F. décolorimètre, < L. decolor, adj., deprived of color, + Gr. μέτρον, measure.] 1. An instrument for measuring the effects of bleaching-powder.—2. A graduated tube containing a solution of indigo and molasses, used to test the power of charcoal in a divided state in decolorizing solutions.

decolorisation (dē-kul'gr-i-sā-shŏn), n. [< de-colorise + -ation.] The act or process of depriving of color; the process of bleaching or bleaching. Also spelled decolorization, decolorisation, decolorisation.

decolorise (dē-kul'gr-is), v. t.; pret. and pp. decolorised, ppr. decolorising. [< de-priv. + color + -ise. Cf. decolorate.] To deprive of color; bleach. Also spelled decolorize, decolorise, decolorise.

The syrup is then whitened or decolorized by filtering it through a bed of coarsely powdered animal charcoal.

J. H. Nichols, Firsaid Science, p. 29.

decoloriser (dē-kul'gr-i-sēr), n. That which decolorizes.

The different coloring-matters are retained in different degrees of intensity in the tissues or cell elements, in the presence of the individual groups of decolorizers, such as alcohol, acetic acid, and glycerine.

Huappe, Bacteriological Investigations (trans.), p. 48.

decolour, decolourization, etc. See decolor, etc.

decomplex (dē-kŏm-pleks), a. [< de- + complex.] Repeatedly compound; made up of complex constituents.

Now the plethoric form of period, this monster model of sentence, bloated with decomplex intercalations, . . . is the prevailing model in newspaper eloquence. De Quincey, Style, I.

Decomplex idea. See idea.

decomposability (dē-kŏm-pō-sā-bil'i-ti), n. [< decomposable: see -bility.] Capability of being decomposed; the quality of being decomposable.

The ready decomposability of vermilion . . . cannot be removed by boiling in potash. Ure, Dict., IV. 281.

decomposable (dē-kŏm-pō-sā-bl), a. [= F. décomposable; as decompose + -able.] Capable of being decomposed or resolved into constituent primary elements.

Manifestly decomposable states of consciousness cannot exist before the states of consciousness out of which they are composed. H. Spencer, Education, p. 150.

decompose (dē-kŏm-pōs'), v.; pret. and pp. decomposed, ppr. decomposing. [= F. décomposer; as de-priv. + composer; cf. decomposed.] 1. trans. To separate into its constituent parts; resolve into its original elements; specifically, to reduce (an organic body) to a state of dissolution by a process of natural decay.

In some preliminary experiments it was found difficult to completely decompose cuprous oxide after it had been dried. Amer. Jour. Sci., Whole No. CXXI, p. 54.

Whatever be the origin of the electricity, the quantity of water decomposed is proportional to the quantity of electricity which passes. Atkinson, tr. of Mascart and Joubert, I. 242.

Decomposing furnace. See furnace.

II. intrans. To become resolved into constituent elements; specifically, to decay; rot; putrefy.—syn. Decay, Putrefy, etc. See rot.

decomposed (dē-kŏm-pōs'), p. a. 1. In a state of decomposition.—2. In ornith., separated; specifically said of a feather the web of which is decomposed by disconnection of the barbs, or of a bundle of feathers, as those of the crest, which stand or fall apart from one another: used like decomposed in botany.

decomposer (dē-kŏm-pō-sēr), n. That which decomposes.

The cinabar may be brought into intimate contact with its decomposer. Ure, Dict., III. 228.

decomposite (dē-kŏm-pōs-it), a. and n. [< L. decompositus, formed from a compound, < de- + composui, compound, composite: see composite.] 1. a. 1. Compounded a second time; compounded with things already composite.—2. In bot., same as decomposed.

II. n. Anything compounded of composite things.

Decomposites of three metals, or more, are too long to inquire of. Bacon, Questions Touching Metals.

Compounds wherein one element is compound are called decomposites. . . . The decomposite character of such words [as midshipman, gentlemanlike] is often concealed or disguised. Latham, Eng. Lang., § 422.

decomposition (dē-kŏm-pō-siā-shŏn), n. [*< F. décomposition = Sp. descomposicion = Pg. decomposição = It. decomposizione, < NL. *decompositio(-n), < *decomponere, decompose: see decompose, decompose.*] 1. The act or process of separating the constituent elements of a compound body or substance; analysis; resolution; specifically, the process of reducing an organic body to a state of decay or putrefaction.

Having obtained oxygen and hydrogen by the decomposition of water, it may naturally be inquired whether these substances cannot in turn be decomposed. To this question it can be simply replied that the most skilful chemists have hitherto failed to effect such decomposition. Huxley, Physiology, p. 105.

2. The state of being decomposed or resolved; release from previous combinations; disintegration; specifically, decay of an organic body.

The new continents are built out of the ruins of an old planet; the new races fed out of the decomposition of the foregoing.

Emerson, Essays, 1st ser., p. 274.

The latter half of the nineteenth century will be known to the future historian as especially the era of the decomposition of orthodoxies.

J. Fiske, Evolutionist, p. 209.

3. [With ref. to decomposé, q. v.] The act of compounding together things which are themselves compound; a combination of compounds.

A dextrous decomposition of two or three words together.

Instruct. Concerning Oratory.

Chemical decomposition. See chemical decomposition of forces, in week, same as resolution of forces (which see, under force).—Decomposition of light, the separation of a beam of light into its prismatic colors.

decompound (dē-kom-poun'd), v. t. [= Sp. decompor = It. decomporre, < *NL. *decomponere*, < L. de-, priv. (in def. 2, de- intensive) + componere, put together, compound; see de- and compound<sup>1</sup>, and cf. decompose.] 1. To decompose. [Rare.]

It divides and decomposes objects into a thousand curious parts.

Hazlitt.

2. To compound a second time; compound or form out of that which is already compound; form by a second composition.

All our complex ideas whatsoever . . . however compounded and decomposed, may at last be resolved into simple ideas.

Locke, Human Understanding, II. 22.

decompound (dē-kom-poun'd), a. [de- + compound, a.: see decompound, v., and cf. decompose.] 1. Composed of things which are themselves compound; compounded a second time.

—2. In bot., divided into a number of compound divisions, as a leaf or panicle; repeatedly cleft or cut into an indefinite number of unequal segments.

A decompound leaf is one in which the primary petiole gives off subsidiary petioles, each supporting a compound leaf. Also decompound.

decompound (dē-kom-poun'd), n. A decompound (which see).

decompoundable (dē-kom-poun'd-ə-bl), a. [decompound + -able.] Capable of being decompound.

decompoundly (dē-kom-poun'd-lī), adv. In a decompound manner.

decompt, n. [OF. descompt, account, back reckoning, < descompter, account for, account back; see discount and count<sup>1</sup>.] Deduction or percentage held as security.

deconcentrate (dē-kon-sen-trāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. deconcentrated, ppr. deconcentrating. [de- priv. + concentrate.] To spread or scatter from a point or center; destroy the concentration of, as of bodies of troops. Times (London).

deconcentration (dē-kon-sen-trā'shon), n. [deconcentrate + -ion.] The act of deconcentrating, or of dispersing whatever has been concentrated in one place or point: the opposite of concentration.

deconcoct (dē-kon-kok't), v. t. [de- priv. + concoct.] To decompose or resolve.

Since these Benedictines have had their cruettes deconcocted.

Fuller, Ch. Hist., VI. 267.

deconsecrate (dē-kon-sē-kra't), v. t.; pret. and pp. deconsecrated, ppr. deconsecrating. [de- priv. + consecrate. Cf. F. déconsecrer.] To deprive of the character conferred by consecration; secularize.

Though it was possible to sweep the idols out of the Kaaba, it was not so easy to deconsecrate the spot, but far more convenient to give it a new sanction.

Encyc. Brit., XIX. 98.

deconsecration (dē-kon-sē-kra'shon), n. [deconsecrate + -ion.] The act of deconsecrating or of depriving of sacred character; specifically, the ceremony employed in deconsecrating or rendering secular anything consecrated, as a church or a cemetery. The forms to be observed do not appear in the prayer-book, and the ceremony is of very rare occurrence.

decontumace capiendo (dē kon-tā-mā's kapi-en'dō). [L. (NL.): L. de, of; contumace, abl. of contumax, contumacious; capiendo, abl. ger. of capere, take; see capacious, capias, etc.] In

Eng. law, a writ issuing out of chancery, on the suggestion of an ecclesiastical court, to attach a party to a proceeding in the latter court for contempt of its authority: a procedure substituted by the act of 53 Geo. III., c. 127, for the de excommunicato capiendo.

decopet, p. a. [*ME. pp. of *decopen*, < OF. decoper, decopper, F. decouper, cut, slash, < de- + couper, cut; see comp1.] Slashed; cut in figures.

Shode he was with grette maistris
With shoon decopet, and with lass [lace].

Rom. of the Rose, l. 843.

decopperization (dē-kop-er-i-zā'shon), n. [de- + copperize + -ation.] The process of removing copper or freeing from copper.

decopperize (dē-kop-er-i-zē), v. t.; pret. and pp. decopperized, ppr. decopperizing. [L. de, of, from, + copper + -ize.] To free from copper.

The sine remaining in the decopperized lead is oxidized in a reverberatory furnace.

Ure, Dict., III. 71.

decorament (dek-ō-rā-ment), n. [L. decoramentum: see decorament.] Same as decorament.

decorate (dek-ō-rāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. decorated, ppr. decorating. [L. decoratus, pp. of decorare (> F. décorer = Sp. Pg. decorar = It. decorare = D. decoreren = G. decorieren = Dan. dekorere = Sw. dekorera), adorn, distinguish, honor, < decus (decor), ornament, grace, dignity, honor, akin to decor, elegance, grace, beauty, ornament, < decere, become, befit, whence ult. decent, q. v.] 1. To distinguish; grace; honor.

My harts was fully sette, and my minde deliberately determined to have decorated this realm with wholesome laws, statutes, and ordinances.

Hall, Kiv. IV., an. 23.

2. To deck with something becoming or ornamental; adorn; beautify; embellish: as, to decorate the person; to decorate an edifice.

A grave and forcible argument, decorated by the most brilliant wit and fancy.

Macaulay, Warren Hastings.

With lupin and with lavender,
To decorate the fading year.

D. M. Moor, Birth of the Flower.

3. To confer distinction upon by means of a badge or medal of honor: as, to decorate an artist with the cross of the Legion of Honor.

—Syn. 2. Adorn, Ornament, Decorate, etc. (see adorn), bedizen, glid, trick out, embellish.

decorated (dek-ō-rā-ted), p. a. Adorned; ornamented; embellished.—Decorated style, in arch., the second style of English Pointed architecture, in use from the end of the thirteenth to the beginning of the fifteenth century, when it degenerated into the Perpendicular.

It is distinguished from the earlier Pointed style, from which it was developed, by the more flowing lines of its tracery, especially of its windows, by the more intricate and less conventional combinations of its foliage, by the greater elaboration of its capitals, moldings, finials, etc., and generally by a style of ornamentation more naturalistic and as a rule less in accordance with true artistic principles. The Decorated style has been divided into two periods: namely, the Early or Geometric Decorated period, in which the ornament consists especially of simple curves and lines and combinations of them; and the Decorated style proper, in which the peculiar characteristics of the style are most emphasized, and meager or involved arrangement of lines in ornament takes the place of the broad treatment of masses which characterizes earlier medieval work.

decoration (dek-ō-rā'shon), n. [= F. décoration = Sp. decoración = Pg. decoração = It. decorazione = D. decoratie = G. decoratie = Dan. Sw. dekoratie, < ML. decoratio (a-), < L. decorare, decorate; see decorate.] 1. The act of decorating or adorning with something becoming or ornamental; the art of adorning, ornamenting, or embellishing.

We know that decoration is not architectural decoration unless it emphasizes construction.

The Century, XXI. 544.

Decorated Architecture of the period of transition to the later Decorated style.—Tomb of Bishop Bridport, Salisbury Cathedral, Eng. land.

2. The conferring of a badge, as of an order, or a medal of honor; hence, the badge or medal conferred.—3. That which embellishes; anything which decorates or adorns; an ornament.

Our church did even then exceed the Romish in ceremonies and decorations.

Marvell, Works, II. 208.

It is a rule, without any exception, in all kinds of composition, that the principal idea, the predominant feeling, should never be confounded with the accompanying decorations.

Macaulay, Petrarch.

4. In music, a general term for the various melodic embellishments, as the trill, the appoggiatura, etc.—5. In pyrotechny, the compositions placed in port-fires, rockets, paper shells, etc., to make a brilliant display when the case is exploded.—Castellan decoration, in ceram., the system of decoration by means of a point producing scratches through an exterior thin layer of color, revealing the color of the body beneath: so called from the asserted origin of this decoration at Città di Castello, in Umbria, Italy. (Compare graffito.)—Decoration day, the day set apart in the United States for observance in memory of the soldiers and sailors who fell in the civil war of 1861–65: originally called Memorial day. The day is observed by processions and orations in honor of the dead, and particularly by decorating their graves with flowers. Originally different days were selected for this purpose in the different States; but usage has now settled upon May 30th, which has been made a legal holiday in most of the States. The custom is observed both in the North and in the South.—Embroidery decoration, in ceram., a name given to a surface-decoration similar to that called lace-decoration, but more massive, and usually in white on a dark ground.—Porcellana decoration, in ceram., decoration by means of blue leafage, scrolls, and the like, on a white ground, as if in imitation of Oriental porcelain: especially applied to Italian majolica so decorated.—Trophy decoration, decoration by means of groups of arms, musical instruments, scrolls, tools of painting and sculpture, and the like, or what may by extension be called trophies, especially in Italian decorative art.—Syn. 3. Embellishment, furniture, trapping.

decorative (dek-ō-rā-tiv), a. [de- + decorate + -ive.] 1. Of or pertaining to decoration; concerned with decoration: as, decorative art.

Small objects which are attractive in colour and shape will naturally be used by the savage for decorative purposes.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 412.

2. Of an ornamental nature; decorating; embellishing.

The great choir-window of Lichfield is the noblest glass-work I remember to have seen. I have met nowhere colors so chaste and grave, and yet so rich and true, or a cluster of designs so piously decorative, and yet so pictorial.

H. James, Jr., Trans. Sketches, p. 24.

Decorative art. See art. Decorative notes, in music, short notes added to the essential notes of a melody by way of embellishment.

decorativeness (dek-ō-rā-tiv-nes), n. The quality of being decorative.

Hence the spelling ducky, and finally the compound decoy-ducky, which, though thus developed from decoy, may be considered as made up of duck + coy, n., also used in sense of decoy. The D. words, cenden-koot, formerly cenden-koot, a 'duck-coy' (D. cend = AS. cend, a duck: see drake and anas), koot-cend, a 'coy-duck', koot-man, a decoyman, vogel-koot, a bird-rage, a decoy, are compounded with D. koot, a cage, a bird-cage, a fold, hive (the source of E. coy, q. v., but not connected with E. coy or decoy), either independently of the accidentally similar E. words, or in imitation of them.] I. trans. 1. To lure into a snare; entrap by some allurements or deception: as, to decoy ducks within gunshot; troops may be decoyed into an ambush.

decoy (dē-kōi'), n. [de- + coy, v.] 1. A lure employed to entice game into a snare or within the range of a weapon; specifically, an image of a bird, as a duck, or a trained living bird or animal, used to lure wild birds or animals into the power of man; hence, also, a person similarly employed with respect to other persons. Hence—2. Anything intended to lead into a snare; any lure or allurements that deceives and misleads into evil, danger, or the power of an enemy; a stratagem employed to mislead or lead into danger.—3. A place, as a pond, furnished with an arrangement for luring wild fowl into it. Several channels or pipes of a curved form, covered with light hooped network, lead from the pond in various directions. The wild fowl are enticed to enter the wide mouth of the channel by tamed ducks trained for the purpose, or by grain scattered on the water. When they are well within the covered channel they are driven up into the funnel-net at the far end, where they are easily caught.

decoy-bird (dē-kōi'-bērd), n. A bird, or an imitation of one, used as a lure to entice others into a net or within gunshot.

decoy-duck (dē-kōi'-dūk), n. 1. In fooling, a duck, or an imitation of one, used as a decoy.—2. A person acting as a decoy for other persons.

Admit no . . . Decoy-Duck to wheedle you a top-scrambling to the Play in a Mask.
Congress, Way of the World, iv. 5.

decrease (dē-kra's-i-fē), v. t.; pret. and pp. decreased, pp. decreasing. [L. de-priv. + crasse, thick, + -fy.] To make less crass.

I might at least
Eliminate, decrease my faith,
Since I adopt it, keeping what I must,
And leaving what I can.
Browning, Bishop Blomgram's Apology.

decrease (dē-kra's-i-fē), v. t.; pret. and pp. decreased, pp. decreasing. [ME. decrasen, decrecen, OF. decresser, decrastre, decrastre, decrastre, F. decroître = Sp. decrecer = Pg. decrecer = It. decrescere (cf. with altered prefix, ME. decrescen, OF. decrescestre, decrastre = Pr. decrescer = Sp. decrecer = It. decrescere, ML. decrescere, L. decrescere, decrease, become less, wane, cf. de-, from, away, + crecere, grow: see crecere. Cf. crase, decrease, increase.] I. intrans. To become less; lessen; be diminished gradually in extent, bulk, quantity, or amount, or in strength, influence, or excellence: as, the days decrease in length from June to December.

Olyvres now and o'er their green isles
Do dounge hem in decreasage of the moone.
Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 70
He must increase, but I must decrease. John III. 30.

Decreasing series. See progression.—Mya, Decreas, Diminish, Diminute, Contract; to lessen, abate, ebb, subside, fall off, fall away, shrink. The first three all mean a becoming less by degrees. Decrease more often implies that the causes are imperceptible or not necessarily perceptible, acting, it may be, from within the object itself: as, the swelling decreases daily. Diminish generally implies the action of some external cause which is more or less in the mind of those concerned: as, his fortune diminishes daily through extravagance; the troops diminish steadily under disease and conflict. Decrease is the appropriate word for reduction of bulk or volume, diminish for reduction of number. These distinctions are not always observed. To diminish is to become small in size, amount, or number by slow and imperceptible degrees, the reduction being always undesirable and the result a sort of attenuation: as, the army diminished to a few thousands; the child dwindled to a mere skeleton. To contract is to become less by shrinkage or a drawing together of parts or elements: it implies loss of size, bulk, or extent, without the loss of constituent substance or parts usually expressed by the other words.

So many wives, who have yet their husbands in their arms; so many parents, who have not the number of their children lessened; so many villages, towns, and cities, whose inhabitants are not decreased, their property violated, or their wealth diminished, are yet owing to the sober conduct and happy results of your advice.
Dryden, King Arthur, Dod.

If the activities of a living body involve an expenditure not made good by nutrition, diminishing follows.
H. Spencer, Data of Ethics, § 53.

The anatomical structure of the eye is such that a moderately contracted pupil is in contact with the lens-surface.
Quain, Med. Dict., p. 480.

II. trans. To make less; lessen; make smaller in dimensions, amount, quality, excellence, etc.; reduce gradually or by small deductions.

Nor cherish'd they relations poor,
That might decrease their present store. Prior.

decrease (dē-kra's-i-fē), n. [ME. decresce, OF. decresce, decrastre, decrastre, decrecen, decrease, from the verb.] 1. A becoming less; diminution; wane (as applied to the moon); decay: as, a rapid decrease of revenue or of strength.

See in what time the seeds set in the increase of the moon come to a certain height, and how they differ from those that are set in the decrease of the moon.
Bacon, Nat. Hist.

2. The amount by which something is lessened; extent of loss or decrement: as, a great decrease in production or of income.

decreasingly (dē-kra's-i-fē), adv. In a decreasing manner; by decrease.

decreation (dē-kra's-i-fē), n. [de-priv. + creation.] The undoing of an act of creation. [Rare.]

Especially the continual decreation and annihilation of the souls of the brutes.

Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 45.

decree (dē-kra's-i-fē), n. [ME. decree (cf. So. decreet), OF. decret, F. décret = Sp. Pg. It. decreto = D. dekreet = G. decret = Dan. Sw. dekret, L. decretum, a decree, ordinance, decision, neut. of decretus, pp. of decernere, decree, decide (cf. E. decern): see decern.] 1. A special ordinance or regulation promulgated by civil or other authority; an authoritative decision having the force of law.

He made a decree for the rain. Job xlviii. 28.
And statesmen at her council met
Who knew the seasons when to take Occasion by the hand, and make
The bounds of freedom wider yet
By shaping some angust decree.

Tennyson, To the Queen.

On December 7, 1895, the Emperor of Brazil issued a decree which opened the Amazon . . . to the commerce of all the world from and after September 7, 1897.
E. Schuyler, Amer. Diplomacy, p. 342.

Specifically—2. In Rom. law, a determination or judgment of the emperor on a suit between parties. Among the Romans, when all legislative power was centered in the emperor, it became the custom to ask for their opinion and decision in disputed cases. Their decisions were called decrees, and formed part of the imperial constitutions.

3. An edict or a law made by an ecclesiastical council for regulating business within its jurisdiction. The term is used in ecclesiastical history chiefly as a designation of certain dogmatic and authoritative decisions on disputed points in theology and discipline in the Roman Catholic Church: as, the Decrees of the Council of Trent, the Decrees of Auricular Confession by the Fourth Lateran Council.

4. A judicial decision or determination of a litigated cause; specifically, the sentence or order of a court of chancery, or of a court of admiralty or of probate, after a hearing or submission of the cause. The word judgment is now used in reference to the decisions of courts having both common law and equity powers. See also act, article, bill, charter, code, constitution, edict, law, ordinance, provision, statute.

5. In theol., one of the eternal purposes of God, whereby for his own glory he has foreordained whatsoever comes to pass. Whether these decrees are absolute or conditional—that is, whether they are according to the counsel of his own will, "without any foresight of faith or good works, or any other thing in the creature, as conditions or causes moving him thereto" (West. Conf. of Faith, iii), or are based upon his foreknowledge of the character and course of his free creatures—is a contested question, the Calvinists taking the former view, the Arminians the latter.

By the decree of God for the manifestation of his glory, some men and angels are predestinated unto everlasting life and others foreordained to everlasting death.

West. Conf. of Faith, iii. § 3.

6. The judgment or award of an umpire in a case submitted to him.—Absolute decree, a decision that something shall be done with no condition attached to it.—Berlin decree, Milan decree, two decrees of Napoleon I. against Great Britain, enforcing his continental system. The first, issued at Berlin November 21st, 1806, closed against British commerce all continental ports under the control of France (including those of Italy, Spain, Holland and Germany), confiscated all British merchandise wherever found, forbade correspondence with Great Britain, and ordered that all British subjects found within the jurisdiction of France or its allies should be made prisoners of war. The second decree, issued at Milan December 17th, 1807, declared all neutral vessels connected in any way with British commerce or intercourse to be thereby denaturalized, and ordered that they should be treated as English.—Declaratory decree. See declaratory.—Decree arbitral, in Swiss law, an award by one or more arbiters.—Decree condemnatory. See decree of abolition, under abolition.—Decree dative, in Swiss law, a decree of a commissary conferring on an executor (not being an executor nominate) the office of executor.—Decree in absence, in Swiss law, a decree pronounced against a defender who has not appeared or pleaded on the merits of the case: the same as judgment by default in English common law.—Decree nisi (decree unless), in Eng. law, a decree conditioned on some future event, usually the default of the adverse party to show cause or to perform a condition.—Decree of abolition. See abolition.—Decree of constitution. See decree of locality, in Swiss law.—Decree of the court, allowing the modest stipend on the different hereditary offices in the proportion in which they are to pay it.—Decree of modification, in Swiss law, a decree of the third court modifying a stipend to the clergyman, but not allowing it upon the different hereditary offices.—Decree of registration, in Swiss law, a decree obtained, without an action, for payment of money secured by a bond or deed containing a clause of consent to registration for execution.—Decree of valuation of lands, in Scots law, a decree of the feudal court determining the extent and value of a heritor's lands.—Scots law, 1. and 2. Edict, Statute, etc. See law.—4 and 6. Judgment, Order, etc. (see decision); proclamation, fiat, mandata.

decree (dē-kre'), v. [Of. F. décreter = Sp. Pg. decretar = It. decretare = D. dekretieren = G. dekretieren = Dan. dekretere = Sw. dekretera, < ML. decretare, decree; from the noun: see decree, n.] I. trans. 1. To order or promulgate with authority; issue as an edict or ordinance.

Thou shalt also decree a thing, and it shall be established. Job xlii. 22.

He [William I.] *decree*d there should be Sheriffs in every Shire, and Justices of Peace for Punishment of Malefactors. Baker, Chronicles, p. 27.

Wherefore fatalists that hold the necessity of all human actions and events may be reduced to these three heads: First, such as, asserting the Deity, suppose it irrelative to decree and determine all things, and thereby make all actions necessary to us.

Cudworth, Intellectual System, i. 1.

In the autumn of 1535 Cromwell and his agents effected a visitation of the monasteries, the report of which insured their condemnation; and, in the last session of the Long Parliament in 1536, the dissolution of the smaller houses was *decree*d. Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 258.

2. To determine judicially; resolve by sentence; adjudge: as, the court *decree*d a restoration of the property.

Thine be the laurel-wreath *decree*d,
Who both write well, and write full speed.
Cowper, To Robert Lloyd.

3. To determine or resolve legislatively; determine or decide on.

They themselves *decree*d
Their own revolt, not I. Milton, P. L., iii. 114.

—Scots law. To order, ordain, command, enact.
II. intrans. To determine; predetermine immutably; constitute or appoint by edict.

All hast thou spoken as my thoughts are, all
As my eternal purpose hath *decree*d.
Milton, P. L., iii. 172.

decreasable (dē-kre's-g-ib), a. [< decree + -able.] Capable of being decreed.

decrement (dē-kre'ment), n. [< decree + -ment.] The act of decreeing; decree.

This unjust decrement. Pope, Martyrs.

decrear (dē-kre'ér), n. [< decree + -er.] One who decrees.

In thy book it is written of me, says Christ, that I should do thy will; he is not willing only, but the first decrear of it, it is written of me. Goodson, Works, i. iii. 108.

decreet (dē-kre't), n. [< OF. decret, < L. decretum, a decree; see decrec.] In Scots law, a decree. See decree, n., 1.

Friendraught . . . obtained a decreet against him for 300,000 merks. Spalding, Hist. Troubles in Scotland, i. 61.

decrement (dek-rē'ment), n. [= Sp. Pg. It. decremento, < LL. decrementum, a decrease, < L. decrescere, decrease: see decrease.] 1. The act or state of decreasing; the becoming gradually less; lessening; waste.

I do not believe the understanding part of man received any natural decrement or diminution.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), i. 723.

Rocks, mountains, and the other elevations of the earth suffer a continual decrement. Woodward.

2. The quantity lost by gradual diminution or waste; specifically, in math., the small part by which a variable quantity becomes less and less.

The increments in time are proportional to the decrements in pressure. Frankland, Chemistry, iii. i. 380.

Each increment of evolution entails a decrement of reproduction that is not accurately proportionate, but somewhat less than proportionate.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 304.

3. In astr., the condition of waning: said of the moon. It is represented by turning the horns of the crescent toward the sinister side. Also called detriment.—4. In crystal., a successive diminution of the layers of molecules applied to the faces of the primitive form, by which the secondary forms are hypothetically produced.—Equal decrement of life, in the doctrine of annuities of insurance companies, the theory that in a given number of lives there should be an equal annual decrease within a given period.

decrepit (dē-krep'it), a. [< OF. decrepit, F. décrépit = Sp. decretito = Pg. It. decrepito, < L. decrepitus, an adj. applied to old men and old animals, and usually translated 'very old': lit. meaning uncertain; usually explained as 'noiseless' (because 'old people creep about quietly' or 'like shadows'), otherwise as 'broken'; < de-priv. + crepitus, pp. of crepare, make a noise, rattle, break with a crash: see crepitat.] Broken down in health, physical or mental, especially from age; wasted or worn by infirmities; weakened, especially by age.

An old decrepit wretch
That has no sense, no show.

R. Jonson, Volpone, iii. 4.

He was already decrepit with premature old age.
Melley, Dutch Republic, i. 102.

[Sometimes incorrectly spelled decrepid.]

Last, winter comes, decrepid, old, and dull.
Jennys, An Ode.

decrepitate (dē-krep'i-tāt), v.; pret. and pp. decrepitated, ppr. decrepitating. [< NL. as if **decrepitatus*, pp. of **decrepitare* > F. décrépit = Sp. Pg. decrepitar = It. decrepitare, < L. de- + crepitatus, pp. of crepitare, crackle, break with a noise: see crepitat.] I. intrans. To crackle, as salt when roasting.

II. trans. To roast or calcine in a strong heat, so as to cause a continual bursting or cracking of the substance: as, to decrepitate salt.

So will it come to pass in a pot of salt, although decrepitated.
St. F. Browne, Vulg. Err.

decrepitation (dē-krep-i-tā'shən), n. [= F. décrepitation = Sp. decrepitation = Pg. decrepitação = It. decrepitatione, < NL. as if **decrepitatio(n)*, < **decrepitare*: see decrepitate.] The act of snapping or bursting with a crackling noise on being heated, or the crackling noise, accompanying the flying asunder of their parts, made by various salts and minerals when heated. It is caused by the unequal sudden expansion of their substance by the heat, or by the expansion and volatilization of water or other liquid held mechanically within them.

decrepiti (dē-krep'it-il), adv. In a decrepit manner; as one broken down by infirmities.

And she rose up decrepiti
For a last dim look at earth and sea.
Lewis, Vision of Sir Launfal, ii. 1.

decrepitude (dē-krep'it-ū-ē), n. Decrepitude. decrepitude (dē-krep'it-ū-ē), n. [< F. décrepitude = Sp. decrepitud = Pg. decrepitude, < L. as if **decrepitudo*, < decrepitus, decrepit: see decrepit.] The state of being broken down by infirmities, physical or mental, especially infirmities of age.

Many seem to pass on from youth to decrepitude without any reflection on the end of life.

Johnson, Rambler, No. 78.

decrepity (dē-krep'it-i), n. [< ML. decrepiti-tas, < L. decrepitus, decrepit: see decrepit.] Decrepitude.

Honest Credulity
Is a true loadstone to draw on decrepity.
Chapman, All Fools, iv. 1.

decrecendo (It. pron. dē-kre-ahen'dō), n. [It., ppr. of decrecere, < L. decrecere, decrease: see decrease.] In music, a gradual diminution of force; a passing from loud to soft: opposed to crescendo, and the same as diminuendo: often indicated by decres., dec., or the sign >.

decreescent (dē-kres'ent), a. and n. [= F. décroissant, etc., < L. decrescen(t)-s, ppr. of decrecere, decrease: see decrease, and cf. erescen(t).] I. a. Decreasing; becoming gradually less; waning, as the moon.

Saddening in her childless castle, sent,
Between the in-crescent and de-crescent moon,
Arms for her son, and loosed him from his vow.
Tennyson, Gareth and Lynette.

Specifically.—(a) In astr., decreasing or waning: said of the moon when represented with the points toward the sinister side. Also decurs. (b) In bot., diminishing gradually from below upward.

II. n. In astr., the moon in her decreescent: used as a bearing. See decrement, 3. decreescent-pinnate (dē-kres'ent-pin'āt), a. In bot., pinnate with leaflets gradually decreasing in size from the base.

decret, n. See decree, decree. decretal (dē-kre'tal), a. and n. [< ML. decretalis, < L. decretum, a decree: see decree.] I. a. 1. Pertaining to or of the nature of a decree; containing a decree or decrees.

When any sentence of a father is cited, and inserted into a decretal epistle of a pope, or any part of the canon law, that sentence is thereby made decretal.
Donne, Sermons, xxii.

2. Done according to a decree; decreed; fatal. [Rare.]

So here's a most decretal end of me.
Chapman, Byron's Tragedy, v. 1.

II. n. [= F. décrétale = Sp. Pg. decretal = It. decretale, < ML. decretale, a decree, neut. of adj. decretalis: see above.] 1. An authoritative order or decree; specifically, a letter of the pope determining some point or question in ecclesiastical law.

What principle . . . had they then to judge of heretics, besides the single dictates or decrees of private bishops?
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), ii. 618.

This is not a process of reasoning, but an act of will—a decretal enveloped in a scientific nimbus.

J. Northcote, Materialism, p. 107.

2. A book of decrees or edicts; a body of laws; specifically (esp.), in the plural, the second part of the canon law: so called because it contains the decrees of sundry popes determining points of ecclesiastical law.

As in canon as in the decretals I can poultre rede a lynce.
Piers Plowman (B), v. 428.

In the year 1280 Gregory IX. had approved of the five books of Decretals codified by Raymond of Penafort from the Extravagantes of the recent popes.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 307.

False Decretals, a collection of canon law, of the ninth century, purporting to have been made by one Isidore Mercator, and unquestioned till the fifteenth century, but since proved to consist largely of spurious or forged papal decretals. Also called Pseudo-Isidorian Decretals, to distinguish them from the collection drawn from the seventh century, attributed to Isidore of Seville, and consisting of genuine documents.

decretat (dē-kre't-ahən), n. [< LL. decretio(n)-, decrece, < L. decretus, pp. of decrevere: see decrease.] A decreasing.

Nor can we now perceive that the world becomes more or less than it was, by which decretion we might guess at a former increase.
Sp. Pearson, Expos. of Creed, i.

decretist (dē-kre'tist), n. [= OF. decretiste (also decretiste: see decretist), F. décretiste = Sp. Pg. decretista (cf. It. decretalista), < ML. decretista, < L. decretum, decree: see decree, decretal. Cf. decretist.] In medieval universities, a student in the faculty of law; specifically, a student of the decretals.

decretistery, n. [ME. decretistrie, < OF. decretistrie, discretistrie, var. of decretiste: see decretist.] A decretist.

At this doctor and diuineur and decretistrie of canon.
Piers Plowman (C), xvi. 55.

decretive (dē-kre'tiv), a. [< L. decret-um, decree, + -ive.] Having the force of a decree; pertaining to a decree.

decretorial (dek-rē-tō-ri-əl), a. [< decretory + -al.] Decretory; authoritative; critical.

Besides the usual or calendary month, there are but four considerable, that is, the month of peragrator, of apparition, of consecration, and the medicinal or decretorial month.
St. F. Browne, Vulg. Err., iv. 2.

decretorily (dek-rē-tō-ri-ly), adv. In a definitive manner; as decreed.

decretory (dek-rē-tō-ri), a. [= F. décretoire = Sp. Pg. It. decretorio, < L. decretorius, < decretum, a decree: see decree.] 1. Pertaining to or following a decree; established by a decree; judicial; definitive.

They that . . . are too decretory and enunciative of speedy judgments to their enemies, turn their religion into revenge.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), i. 618.

2. Sir, you are not sure that when the decretory hour of death overtakes you, you shall have one minute of an hour allowed you to commit your spirits into the hand of the Lord Jesus Christ.
C. Mather, Mag. Christ., iv. 7.

3. Critical; determining; in which there is some definitive event.

The main considerations, which most set off this number, are observations drawn from the motions of the moon, supposed to be measured by sevena, and the critical or decretory dates dependent on that number.
St. F. Browne, Vulg. Err., iv. 12.

decrewt (dē-kre'w), v. t. [*For "decure" (as acure for accure), < OF. decure, F. décur, pp. of decurare, decurare, F. décurare, decrease: see decrease.] To decrease.*

His strength still more, but also still more decrewt.
Spenser, F. Q., iv. vi. 18.

decurial (dē-kri'əl), n. [< decry + -al.] A crying down; a clamorous censure; condemnation by censure.

Forward wit . . . can on no account afterwards submit to a decurial or disparagement of those who write to which they owe their early character and distinction.
Shafesbury, Misc. Reflections, v. 2.

decurier (dē-kri'ér), n. [< decry + -er.] One who decries or traduces clamorously.

The late fanatic decuriers of the necessity of human learning.
South, Sermons, vii. 2.

decrown (dē-kroun'), v. t. [< F. découronner, decrown: see decrown.] To deprive of a crown; decrown. [Rare.]

Dethroning and decrowning princes with his foot, as it pleases him [the pope].
Halswell, Ann. to Dr. Carrier (1816), p. 27.

He holds it to be no more sin the decrowning of kings than our puritans do the suppression of bishops.
St. F. Ousebury, Characters.

decuration (dē-kras-tā'shən), n. [< de-priv. + curatio(n).] The act of removing a crust.

deery (dē-kri'), v. t.; pret. and pp. decried, ppr. decriving. [< F. décrier, OF. decrier, cry down, discredit, disparage, < de- (L. dis-) + crio, cry: see cry.] 1. To cry down; speak disparagingly of; censure as faulty or worthless; clamor against: as, to decur a poem.

For small errors they whole plays decur. Dryden.

Far be it from me to decur moral virtue, which even heathens have granted to be a reward to itself.

Sp. Atterbury, Sermons, I, Pref. to xi.

Dear, charming nymph, neglected and despoiled,
My shame in crowds, my solitary pride.

Goldsmith, Des. VII., l. 411.

2. To deprive of credit officially.

The king may at any time decur, or cry down, any coin of the kingdom, and make it no longer current.

Blackstone, Com., I, 278.

=Syn. 1. Decur, Depreciate, Detract from, Derogate from, Disparage, run down, discredit. These words agree in expressing an effort to lower the esteem in which a person or thing is held. If the effort is unjust, the injustice is not so conspicuous as in the words compared under aspere. Decur, to cry down, clamor against, implies activity and publicity; it is hardly applicable to persons. Depreciate, primarily to lower the value of, is less forcible than decur, and may apply to persons. Detract from and derogate from have almost precisely the same meaning — to take from or diminish reputation, as by caviling, ascribing success to accident, good conduct to low motives, etc. Disparage, to make a thing unequal to what it was in reputation; under-rate. The last four need not have a personal subject: as it would derogate very much from his standing; it would disparage him in public estimation if it were known.

The Administration and its friends have been attempting to circumscribe, and to decur, the powers belonging to other branches.

D. Webster, Speech, Oct. 1st, 1832.

Our vulgar luxury depreciates objects not fitted to adorn our dwellings.

Marg. Fuller, Woman in 19th Cent., p. 193.

Wounds by dedolation most frequently occur on the head. Dugliou.

dedolent (dēd'ō-lent), a. [Cf. L. dedolent (t-), pp. of dedolere, cease to grieve, < de-priv. + dolere, grieve: see dole.] Feeling no sorrow or compunction.

When once the criterion or perceptive faculty has lost its tenderness and sensibility, and the mind becomes reprobate, then darkness and light, good and evil, . . . are all one. Then . . . men are dedolent and past feeling.
Hallywell, Saving of Souls, p. 114.

No men [are] so accursed with indelible infamy and dedolent impetuosity as Authors of Heresies.
N. Ward, Simple Cobler, p. 22.

de domo reparando (dē dō'mō rep-g-ran'dō). [L., for the repairing of a building: de, of; domo, abl. of domus, a house, building; reparando, abl. ger. of reparare, repair: see repair.] A writ issued at common law at the suit of an owner against his neighbor whose house he fears will fall, to the damage of his own, or against his co-tenant to compel him to share the expense of repairing property held in common.

deduction (ded-ŭ-k'ŭ-shŭn), n. A misleading; a turning in the wrong direction.

Let any one think of the amount of deduction attempted about the repeal of the Corn Laws.

Hymns to Virginia, etc. (R. E. T. S.), Pref., p. viii.

deduce (dē-dūs'), v. t.; pret. and pp. deduced, ppr. deducing. [= F. déduire = Sp. deducir = Pg. deduzir = It. dedurre, < L. deducere, lead away, bring down, draw away, derive, < de, down, away, + ducere, lead: see duct, duke. Cf. adduce, conduce, etc., and see deduct.] 1†. To lead forth or away; conduct.

He should hither deduce a colony.

Selden, Illustrations of Drayton, xvii.

2†. To trace the course of; describe from first to last.

I will deduce him from his cradle, till he was swallowed up in the gulf of fatality. Sir H. Watson.

The greatest News we now have here is a notable naval fight that was lately betwixt the Spaniard and Hollander, in the Downs; but to make it more intelligible, I will deduce the Business from the Beginning.

Howell, Letters, i. vi. 40.

3. To draw; derive; trace.

My boast is not that I deduce my birth

From Iolus enthron'd.

Cowper, My Mother's Picture.

O goddess, say, shall I deduce my rhymes

From the dire nation in its early times? Pope.

The Toryism of Scott sprang from love of the past; that of Carlyle is far more dangerously infectious, for it is logically deduced from a deep disdain of human nature.

Lovell, Study Windows, p. 141.

4. To derive or conclude as a result of a known principle; draw as a necessary conclusion; infer from what is known or believed. See deduction, and deductive reasoning, under deductive.

Reason is nothing but the faculty of deducing unknown truths from principles already known. Locke.

No just Heroic Poem ever was or can be made, from whence one great Moral may not be deduced.

Addison, Spectator, No. 309.

Certain propensities of human nature are assumed; and from these premises the whole science of politics is synthetically deduced.

Macaulay, Mill on Government.

5†. To bring before a court of justice for decision. Bacon.—6†. To deduct.

A matter of four hundred

To be deduced upon the payment. B. Jonson.

deducement (dē-dūs'mēt), n. [< deduce + -ment.] A deduced proposition; the conclusion of a logical deduction.

What other deducements or analogies are cited out of St. Paul, to prove a likeness between the ministers of the Old and New Testament? Milton, Church-Government.

deducibility (dē-dūs-i-bil'i-ti), n. [< deducible: see -ibility.] The quality of being deducible; deducibleness. Coleridge.

deducible (dē-dūs'i-bl), a. [< deduce + -ible.] 1†. Capable of being brought down.

As if . . . (tod [were]) deducible to human imbecility.

State Trials, Lt.-Col. Lilburne, an. 1649.

2. Capable of being derived by reasoning from known principles or facts; inferable by deduction.

All properties of a triangle . . . are deducible from the complex idea of three lines including a space. Locke.

I will add no more to the length of this sermon than by two or three short and independent rules deducible from it.

Borne, Tristram Shandy, ii. 17.

deducibleness (dē-dūs'i-bl-nes), n. The quality of being deducible.

deductive (dē-dū'tiv), a. [< deduce + -ive.] Performing an act of deduction. [Rare.]

deduct (dē-dūkt'), v. t. [< L. deducere, pp. of deducere, lead away, draw away, subtract, etc.: see deduce.] 1†. To lead forth or away; deduce; conduct.

The Philippiana, . . . a people deducted out of the title of Philippians.

J. Dall, Pref. to Philippians.

2†. To trace out; set forth.

For diverse great and important considerations, which were here too long to be deducted.

Mary, Queen of Scots, Letter to Babington (1586),

[in Howell's State Trials].

3†. To bring down; reduce.

Clark. Why, sir, 'tis nothing: 'tis but so many months, so many weeks, so many—

Onesie. Do not deduct it to days, 'twill be the more tedious; and to measure it by hours seems to be intolerable. Middleton, Measure for Measure, and Rowley, Old Law, iii. 1.

4. To take away, separate, or remove in numbering, estimating, or calculating; subtract, as a counterbalancing item or particular; as, to deduct losses from the total receipts; from the amount of profits deduct the freight-charges.

The late king had also agreed that two and a half per cent should be deducted out of the pay of the foreign troops.

Sp. Burnet, Hist. Own Times, an. 1711.

deduct (dē-dūkt'), v. t. [< deduce + -ive.] 1. Capable of being deducted or withdrawn.—2†. Deductible.

deductible (dē-dūkt'i-bl), a. [< deduct + -ible.] 1. Capable of being deducted or withdrawn.—2†. Deductible.

deduction (dē-dūkt'ŭ-shŭn), n. [L.: see deduction.] Deduction; specifically, in music, the regular succession of notes in the hexachord and the musical system introduced by Guido d'Arezzo, about A. D. 1024. Hence, deductio prima, the notes of the first hexachord; deductio secunda, the notes of the second hexachord; and so on to deductio septima—deductio ad impossibile (Latin translation of Greek ἀποδείξις τοῦ ἀδυνάτου, deduction to the impossible), in logic, the proof of the falsity of a hypothesis by showing that it leads to a conclusion known to be false.

deduction (dē-dūkt'ŭ-shŭn), n. [< ME. deducconoun, < OF. deduccon, F. deduccon = Sp. deduccon = Pg. deduccon = It. deduccone, < L. deducere (n.), deduction, < deducere, lead or take away, deduce, deduct: see deduce and deduct.] 1†. A drawing or tracing out and setting forth.

A complete deduction of the progress of navigation and commerce, from its first principle, to its present age.

Erskin, To my Lord Treasurer.

2†. The act of deriving; derivation.

To them [vowels], as is well known to etymologists, little regard is to be shown in the deduction of one language from another.

Johnson, Eng. Dict., Pref.

3. In logic, derivation as a result from a known principle; necessary inference; also, the result itself, as so concluded. As a term of logic, it is a translation of Aristotle's ἀγωγή (translated deductio by Boethius), and properly signifies an illicite descent from a general principle to the result of that principle in a special case; it is specially used by Aristotle when there is a doubt whether the case truly comes under the principle. By the older logicians it is little used, and not with any exact application. In modern times it has been chiefly employed by those who hold that all reasoning is either a descent from generals to particulars (deduction) or an ascent from particulars to generals (induction). See deductive reasoning, under deductive.

Probation may be either a process of deduction—that is, the leading of proof out of one higher or more general proposition—or a process of induction—that is, the leading of proof out of a plurality of lower or less general judgments.

Sir W. Hamilton.

Deduction . . . is the inverse process of inferring a particular case from a law of cases assumed to be of like nature.

G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, 1st ser., III. iv § 47.

It is astonishing how little of the real life of the time we learn from the Troubadours except by way of inference and deduction.

Lovell, Study Windows, p. 236.

4. The act of deducting or taking away; subtraction; abatement; as, the deduction of the subtrahend from the minuend; prompt payment will insure a large deduction.—5†. A payment; a statement of payments.

The other Curate, of Luddington, payde by the Warden, as aperryth the abuse in the deductions of the same College.

English Glss (R. E. T. S.), p. 232.

Deduction for new, in mercantile law, the allowance, usually one third, made to one who is required to reimburse or to advance the cost of repairing a damage to a vessel caused by the perils of navigation, the presumption being that the renewed part is better than the old.—Deduction of a claim, in law, the proof of a right by showing that it results from principles of law or equity.—Deduction of a concept, in Kantian philosophy, the proof that the concept has a meaning—that is, refers to an object.—Transcendental deduction, in Kantian metaphysics, the proof of the objective validity of any concept.—Syn. & Conclusion, Conclusions, etc. See inference.—6. Subtraction, diminution, discount, tare.

deductive (dē-dūkt'iv), a. [= F. déductif = Sp. Pg. deductivo, < LIL. deducere, < L. deducere, deduce, deduct: see deduce and deduct.] 1. Consisting of deduction; of the nature of or based on inference from accepted principles.

We ought therefore to be fully aware of the modes and degree in which the forms of deductive reasoning are affected by the theory of probability, and many persons might be surprised at the results which must be admitted.

Jeans.

Before deductive interpretation of the general truths, there must be some inductive establishment of them.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 211.

2. Deduced; derived as a conclusion from accepted principles; relating to inference from a principle to the results of that principle in any special case.

He labours to introduce a secondary and deductive Axiom: that although men concede there is a God, yet they should deny his providence.

Dr. T. Browne, Vulg. Err., i. 10.

Deductive method, in the logical system of J. S. Mill, that mode of investigation by which the law of an effect is ascertained from the consideration of the laws of the different tendencies of which it is the joint result. This method consists of three kinds of operation, the first direct induction, the second ratiocination, the third verification.

To the deductive method, thus characterized in its three constituent parts of induction, ratiocination, and verification, the human mind is indebted for its most conspicuous triumphs in the investigation of nature.

Mull, Logic, III. xi § 6.

Deductive reasoning is commonly opposed to inductive, and is meant to include all necessary reasoning (even mathematical induction), together with those probable reasonings which predict results as true in the long run, but excluding those inferences which are regarded as being open to correction in the long run. Thus, if, from counting the letters on a single page, one concludes the proportions of the different letters which will generally be needed in a font of type, the reasoning is inductive; but if, knowing what the proportions generally are, one concludes what will be needed in printing a particular book or page, the reasoning is deductive.

deductively (dē-dūkt'iv-lī), adv. By deduction; in consequence of a general principle.

There is scarce a popular error passing in our days, which is not either directly expressed or deductively contained in this work [Pliny's Natural History].

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., i. 2.

deduct, n. [ME., also dedute and shortened dute, < OF. déduist, dedust = Pr. deduch, < ML. deductus, diversion, pleasure, (in L.) a drawing away, < L. deducere, draw away: see deduct, deduction. For the meaning, cf. destruction.] Pleasure; sport; pastime.

Upon his hand he bar for his deduct

Au eagle tane, as eny lylie whyt.

Chaucer, Knight's Tale (ed. Morris), l. 1319.

Than drue thei forth the day in dedut & in murthe.

William of Palerne (R. E. T. S.), l. 4699.

deduplication (dē-dū-pli-kā'shŭn), n. [*= F. déduplication, < NL. deduplicatio(n), < *deduplicare* (F. dédoubler), divide into two, < L. de- + duplicare, duplicate, double: see duplicate.] In bot., same as chorisus.

dee (dē), v. t. [Sc., = E. die.] To die.

And for bonnie Annie Lawrie

I d lay me down and dee. Scotch song.

dee (dē), n. [Sc., = dey.] A dairymaid. See dey.

deed (dēd), n. [Early mod. E. also deede; < ME. deed, dede, < AS. dād (= OS. dād = OFries. dadi = D. daad = OHG. MHG. tāt, G. tat, that = Ice. dād = Sw. dād = Dan. daad = Goth. ga-dāde), deed, a thing done, with formative -d (orig. pp. suffix: see -d, -d), < dōn (v. dō), do: see do.] 1. That which is done, acted, performed, or accomplished; a doing; an act: a word of extensive application, including whatever is done, good or bad, great or small.

And alle the gode dedes a man doth by his lyve is hitill a-vaille but yet he hane gode ende

Martin (R. E. T. S.), i. 92.

Ther dide Arthur mervellouse dedes of armes, that gretly he was be-holden, bothe on that oon part and on the tother.

Martin (R. E. T. S.), i. 117.

The altering of religion, the making of ecclesiastical laws, with other the like actions belonging unto the power of dominion, are still termed the deeds of the king.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, viii. 1.

And Joseph said unto them, What deed is this that ye have done?

Gen. xlv. 15.

Words are women, deeds are men.

G. Herbert, Jacula Prudentum.

Arthur yet had done no deed of arms.

Tennyson, Coming of Arthur.

The motives of the Inquisitors were, we may presume, good, but their deeds were diabolical.

Pep. Soc. No., XXII. 143.

2. Power of action; agency; performance.

Both will and deed created free. Milton, P. L., v. 549.

3. In law, a writing on parchment or paper, authenticated by the seal of the person whose mind it purports to declare; more specifically, such a writing made for the purpose of conveying real estate. See indenture, and deed poll, below.

Inquire the Jew's house out, give him this deed,

And let him sign it. Shak., M. of V., iv. 2.

Receive this scroll.

A deed of gift, of body, and of soul.

Martine, Doctor Faustus, ii. 1.

Deed for a deed. See bond.—Commencement of deeds. See commencement.—Composition deed. See composition.—Deed of accession, deed of assumption. See accession, assumption.—Deed of bargain and sale. See bargain and sale, under bargain.—Deed of saying, the executing what has been said or promised; performance of what has been undertaken.

In the plainer and simpler kind of people,
The deed of saying is quite out of use.
Shak., T. of A., v. 1.

Deed of trust, a conveyance to one party of property, to be by him held in trust for others. Specifically, a conveyance by or on behalf of a debtor, to a third person, of real or personal property, or both, in trust to secure payment of creditors or to indemnify parties. — Deed poll (dead + poll for poll, pp. of poll, shew), a deed made by one party only: so called because the paper or parchment is out even and not indented. See indenture. — Estoppel by deed. See estoppel. — Gratuitous deed. See gratuitous conveyance, under conveyance. — In deed, in fact; in reality: used chiefly in the phrases in very deed, in deed and in truth. See indeed.

One . . . wrote certain pretty verses of the Emperor Maximilian, to warn him that he should not glory too much in his own strength, for he did in very deed.
Puttenham, Art of Eng. Poets, p. 203.

Let us not love in word, neither in tongue, but in deed and in truth.
John iii. 18.

Narrative of a deed. See narrative. — To acknowledge a deed, to damn a deed, to extend a deed. See the verb. — Syn. 1. Action, Act, Deed, (See action.) Explicit, etc. See feat.

deed (dēd), v. t. [dead, n.] To convey or transfer by deed: as, he deeded all his estate to his eldest son.

deed-box (dēd'box), n. A box for keeping deeds and other valuable papers, and often adapted to the common size of folded papers, usual in lawyers' offices, etc.

deed-doer (dēd'dō'er), n. A doer; a perpetrator.

The deed-doers Matrover and Gourney . . . durst not abide the trial.
Daniel, Hist. Eng., p. 185.

deedful (dēd'fūl), a. [deed + -ful.] Characterised or marked by deeds or exploits; full of deeds; stirring.

You have made the wisest choice,
A life that moves to gracious ends
Thro' troops of unrecording friends,
A deedful life.
Tennyson, To —.

deedily (dēd'i-lī), adv. [deed + -ly.] In a deed manner; actively; busily. [Rare.]

Frank Churchill at a table near her, most deedily occupied about her spectacles.
Jane Austen, Emma, II. 2.

deedless (dēd'les), a. [(= G. thatenlos = leel. dādhlous = Dan. daadlōw) < deed + -less.] Inactive; unmarked by deeds or exploits.

Speaking in deeds, and deedless in his tongue.
Shak., T. and C., iv. 3.

deeds (dēds), n. pl. [E. dial. and Sc. = dead.] Earth, gravel, etc., thrown out in digging; specifically, in coal-mining, refuse rock; attle thrown upon the dump, burrow, or spoil-bank. Also dead. See dead, n., 2. [North. Eng. and Scotch.]

What is taken out of the ditch (vernacularly the deeds) thrown behind this facing to support it
Agric. Narr. Pers., p. 131 (Jamieson.)

deedy (dēd'i), a. [(= G. thätig, active) < deed + -y.] Industrious; active. [Rare.]

Who praiseth a horse that feeds well but is not deedy for the race or travel, speed or length?

In a messenger sent is required celerity, sincerity, constancy; that he be speedy, that he be heedful, and as we say, that he be deedy.
Rev. T. Adams, Works, II. 111

There were grim silent depths in Nic's character; a small deedy spark in his eye, as it caught Christine's, was all that showed his consciousness of her.
T. Hardy, The Wailing Supper, III

deedy (dēd'i), n.; pl. deedies (-diz). A chicken or young fowl. [South. U. S.]

They disputed about the best methods of tending the newly hatched deedies, that had chipped the shell so late in the fall as to be embarrassed by the frosts and the coming cold weather.
E. Craddock, Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 67.

deem (dēm), v. [< ME. domen, < AS. dōman (= ONorth. doema = OS. dōmian = OFries. dōma = D. doemen = MLG. dōmen = OHG. tuomen, MHG. tuemen = leel. dōma = Sw. dōmma = Dan. dōmme = Goth. gadūman), judge, deem, < dōm, judgment, doom: see doom, n., and cf. doom, v.] 1. Trans. 1. To think, judge, or hold as an opinion; decide or believe on consideration; suppose: as, he deemed it prudent to be silent.

And in the fold he left him liggeng,
Denying non other butt that he was dede.
Geoffrey (E. E. T. N.), l. 3023.

I deem I have half a guess of you; your name is Old Honesty.
Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress, p. 203.

And, listening to thy murmur, he shall deem
He hears the rustling leaf and running stream.
Bryant, Evening Wind.

And the men of Parga deemed, though they were mistaken in the thought, that to the mission of Corinth and Venice England had succeeded.

2. To hold in belief or estimation; adjudge as a conclusion; regard as being; account: as, Shakspeare is deemed the greatest of poets.

For never can I deem him less than god.
Dryden, tr. of Virgil's Eclogues, l.

Yet he who saw this Geraldine
Had deem'd her sure a thing divine.
Coleridge, Christabel, II.

That what was deemed wisdom in former times, is not necessarily folly in ours. Storrs, (Cambridge, Aug. 31, 1832).

The provincial writers of Latin devoted themselves with a dreary assiduity to the imitation of models which they deemed classical.
Lowell, Study Windows, p. 220.

34. To judge; pass judgment on; sentence; doom.

He hadde vs preche and bere wittenesse
That he schulde deme bothe quike and dede.
York Plays, p. 463.

The Bowdon doth vs wrong, as thinketh me,
To make vs deme a man withoute lawe.
Geoffrey (E. E. T. N.), l. 1614.

Six judges were disposed
To view and deme the deeds of armes that day.
Spenser, F. Q., IV. III. 4.

44. To adjudge; decree.
If ye deme me death for loving one That loves not me, Spenser.

54. To dispense (justice); administer (law).
By leel men and lyf-holy my lawe shall be demyd
Piers Plowman (C), v. 175.

II. Intrans. To have an opinion; judge; think.

I would not willingly be suspected of deeming too lightly of this drama
Gifford, Int. to Ford's Plays, p. 21 deem (dēm), n. [< deem, v.] Opinion; judgment; surmise.

How now? what wicked deme is this?
Shak., T. and C., iv. 4.

deem (dēm), n. [Variants of dime, disme, q. v.] A tithe; a tenth.

There was granted unto him halfe a deme of the spiritualitie, and halfe a deme of the temporallite Grafton, Edw. II., an. 10.

deemer, n. A judge; an adjudicator.

deemster, dempster (dēm' - demp'stēr), n. [Formerly also demster; < ME. demester, demster, demster, dempster, a judge, < demen, judge: see dēm and -ster. A parallel form is doomster.] A judge; one who pronounces sentences or doom; specifically, the title of two judges in the Isle of Man who act as the chief justices of the island, the one presiding over the northern, the other over the southern, division. (Compare doomster.)

deemet, n. See din.

deep (dēp), a. and n. [Early mod. E. deepe: < ME. deep, depe, < AS. dēop = OS. diop, diap = OFries. diap, diap = D. diop = MLG. diop = OHG. tiuf, MHG. G. tief = leel. dīfūr = Sw. diup = Dan. dyb = Goth. diups, deep; akin to diop, diap, and prob. to diue, dub, q. v. Hence depth, etc.] 1. a. 1. Having considerable or great extension downward, or in a direction viewed as analogous with downward. (a) Especially, as measured from the surface or top downward extending far downward, profound: opposed to shallow as, deep water; a deep mine, a deep valley.

This city (Jerusalem) stands at the south-end of a large plain, . . . and has valleys on the other three sides, which to the east and south are very deep.
Porock, Description of the East, II. 1. 7.

You may think long over those few words without exhausting the deep wells of feeling and thought contained in them.
Ruskin.

(b) As measured from the point of view: extending far above; lofty: as, a deep sky. (c) As measured from without inward: extending or entering far within; situated far within or toward the center.

Return to the earth eagerly light,
The gay armor to get of the gods how,
That he duly deservit in his depe heart.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. N.), l. 6415.

Then he smyte the himself, and maketh the grete Woundes and depe here and there, till he falle down ded.
Manderly, Travels, p. 177.

I think she loves me, but I fear another
Is deeper in her heart.
Bacon, and Fl., King and No King, iv. 2.

The Fangs of a Bear, and the Tusks of a wild Boar, do not bite worse, and make deeper Gashes, than a Goss-quill, sometimes Howell, Letters, II. 2.

(d) As measured from the front backward: long: as, a deep house; a deep lot.

Impaled
On every side with shadowing squadrons deep,
To hide the fraud.
Milton, P. L., vi. 554.

2. Having (a certain) extension as measured from the surface downward or from the front backward: as, a mine 1,000 feet deep; a case 12 inches long and 3 inches deep; a house 40 feet deep; a file of soldiers six deep. — 3. Immersed; absorbed; engrossed; wholly occupied: as, deep in figures.

Let him be judge how deep I am in love.
Shak., As you Like It, iv. 1.

I was in the Coffee-House very deep in advertisements.
Gray, Letters, l. 121.

4. Closely involved or implicated.

It appeared that the Duke of Marlborough was deep in the schemes of St. Germain's.
Walpole, Letters, II. 392.

5. Hard to get to the bottom or foundation of; difficult to penetrate or understand; not easily fathomed; profound; abstruse.

O Lord, . . . thy thoughts are very deep. Ps. xciii. 5.
A people of a deeper speech than thou canst perceive.
Isa. xxxiii. 19.

The blindness of Cupid contains a deep allegory.
Bacon, Physical Fables, viii., Expt.

Deep as are the truths that matter is indestructible and motion continuous, there is a yet deeper truth implied by these two.
J. Fiske, Cosmic Philos., l. 231.

The deep mind of dauntless infancy.
Tennyson, Ode to Memory.

6. Sagacious; penetrating; profound: as, a man of deep insight.

The worthy, to that wegh, that was of wit noble, Depe of discrecion, in dole thof she were,
Sho hermet hym full hyndly, & with hert gods.

Deep clerks she dumba. Shak., Pericles, v. (Gower).

Deep-sea lead-line, a line used for soundings from 20 to 300 fathoms, marked at every 5 fathoms and used with a lead ranging from 60 to 150 pounds in weight. — Deep-sea sounding-machine, the combination of mechanical contrivances by the aid of which soundings may be made to great depths, with a close approach to accuracy. This result has been attained by a combination of improvements, in which great ingenuity has been displayed, and in which the inventive genius of Sir William Thomson has been particularly conspicuous. The principal features of the most perfect sounding-machine are: (1) the sinker, which is a cannon-ball, through which passes a cylinder provided with a valve to collect and retain a specimen of the bottom, the cylinder being, by an ingenious mechanical arrangement, detached from the shot, which remains at the bottom; (2) the line, made of steel wire, weighing about 144 pounds to the nautical mile; (3) machinery for regulating the lowering of the sinker and for reeling in the wire with the cylinder attached in such a manner that the irregular strain due to the motion of the ship may be guarded against and the danger of breakage thus reduced to a minimum. In the deepest accurate sounding yet made the bottom was reached at the depth of 4,056 fathoms, but owing to the breaking of the wire no specimen was obtained. This sounding was made on the "Tuscarora" by Commander G. B. Bellnap, U. S. N., in north latitude 44° 32', east longitude 158° 29'. The deepest sounding yet made in which a specimen of the bottom was brought up was that of the United States Coast Survey steamer "Blake," off Porto Rico, the depth there reached being 4,661 fathoms.

deep-seated (dēp'sē'ted), a. Far removed from the surface; deeply rooted or lodged; firmly implanted: as, a deep-seated disease; deep-seated prejudice.

His grief was too deep-seated for outward manifestation. Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, i. 237.

deep-set (dēp'set), a. Set deeply; fixed far downward or inward, as the eyes in their sockets.

His deep-set eyes.

Bright 'mid his wrinkles, made him seem right wise. William Morris, Earthly Paradise, iii. 334.

deepsome (dēp'sum), a. [deep + -some.] Deep, or somewhat deep.

This said, he [Proteus] diu'd the deepsome wat'rie heapes. Chapman, Idymey, iv.

deep-waisted (dēp'wā'sted), a. Having a deep waist, as a ship when the quarter-deck and fore-castle are raised higher than usual above the level of the spar-deck.

deer (dēr), n. sing. and pl. [Early mod. E. also deor, and often deor, dears; ME. der, deer, < AS. deor, a wild animal, often in combination, wild deor, wildeor, wilder (whence ult. E. wilderness, q. v.), *OS. dier = OFries. dier = D. dier = LG. deer, deert = OHG. der, MHG. der, G. der, thier = Icel. dýr = Sw. djur = Dan. dyr = Goth. dius, a wild animal. Origin uncertain; perhaps orig. an adj., meaning 'wild,' identical with AS. deor, bold, brave, vehement, OHG. horlik, wild. (The AS. deor, bold, brave, vehement, was merged later with deore, E. dear: see dear.) Not connected with Gr. phélos, a wild beast, or with L. ferus, wild, fam. fera (sc. bestia), a wild beast (whence ult. E. ferous, ferocious). The restricted (but not exclusive) use of the word (for Cervus) appears in ME., Icel., Sw., Dan., and G. (in hunters' language), and now prevails in mod. E. It is due to the importance of this animal in the chase. Similarly, in Iceland, dýr is applied esp. to the fox, as the only beast of prey. In some parts of the United States the horse, as the most important of a general class, is called simply beast or critter (creature); a 'critter company' is a cavalry company (Prov., U. S.)] 1. Any wild quadruped.*

But mice, and rats, and such small deer,
Have been Tom's food for seven long year. Shak., Lear, iii. 4.

2. The general name of the solid-horned ruminants of the family Cervidae, and especially of the genus Cervus. See these words. Most of the deer have solid deciduous horns, of the kind called antlers, in the male only; but in the reindeer they are present in both sexes; in the musk-deer (Moschus) they are wanting. The largest living deer are the elk of Europe and the moose of America; the smallest are the muntjacs and musk-deer, which are further distinguished by the large tusk-like canine teeth of the males. The term deer being so comprehensive, and the animals being so conspicuous, the leading kinds have mostly received distinctive names, as the reindeer, roe-deer, musk-deer, etc. (See these words, and also brocket, elk, moose, roe, stag, wapiti, caribou, black-tail.) Deer are found fossil as far back as the Pliocene period. The best-known extinct species is the Irish elk, Cervus megaloceros. The leading genera of living deer are Acer, Rangifer, Dama, Cervus (with many subgenera), Capreolus, Cervulus, Moschus, and Hydropotes. The species are numerous, and are found in most continental parts of the world, excepting southern Africa and Australia. The common deer of the United States is Cervus virginianus. See Cervinus.

3. A term loosely applied to the chevrotains, of the family Tragulidae (which see), from their resemblance to musk-deer. — Axis-deer, Cervus axis. — Barasingha deer, (Cervus duravalli), of the Himalayas. — Barbary deer, Cervus barbarus, the only true deer of Africa, found along the Mediterranean coast, from Tunis to the slopes of the Atlas range. — Cashmere deer, Cervus cashmirianus. — Fallow-deer. See Dama. The Mesopotamian fallow-deer is Dama mesopotamica. — Formosan deer, Cervus formosus. — Gemal deer, Purellia chelone. — Japanese deer, Cervus shiro. — Manchurian deer, Cervus manchuricus. — Moose. See moose. — Paraná deer, Cervus campestris, of South America. — Panama deer, Cervus idi. — Paraná deer, Cervus narai. — Philippine deer, Cervus philippinus. — Pudu deer, Pudu pudu, of South America. — Red deer, the common stag, Cervus elaphus, a native of the forests of Europe and Asia where the climate is temperate. Red deer were in former times very abundant in the forests of England, and were special objects of the chase. They are still plentiful in the Highlands of Scotland, and care is taken in rearing them in the deer-parks throughout England. See stag. — Rusa deer, Cervus hippelaphus. See Rusa. — Sambur deer, Cervus arctiotis. — Spotted deer. Same as axis, 1. — Timor deer, Cervus timorensis. (See also hog-deer, mule-deer, water-deer.)

deerberry (dēr'ber'), n. [pl. deerberries (-iz).] 1. The aromatic wintergreen of America, Gaultheria procumbens. — 2. The squaw-huckleberry, Vaccinium stamineum. — 3. The partridge-berry, Mitchella repens.

deer-lick (dêr'lik), n. A spot of ground, naturally or artificially salt, which is resorted to by deer to nibble or lick the earth.

deer-mouse (dêr'mow), n. 1. A common name of the American jumping-mouse, Zapus ludovicianus, the only member of the family Zapodidae (which see): so called from its agility. It is a species about 4 inches long, with a longer scaly tail and enlarged hind quarters and hind feet, by means of which it clears several feet at a bound. The color is yellowish brown, darker on the back and paler below. It is generally distributed

Deer-mouse, or jumping mouse (Zapus ludovicianus) in woodland of the United States and British America.

2. A popular name of several species of true mice indigenous to North America, of the family Muridae and genus Hesperomys. It is especially applied to the common white-footed mouse (H. leucopus), which is of a grayish or yellowish brown color above, with snow-white under parts and paws, and the tail bicolored. It is about 3½ inches long, the tail less, and is very generally distributed in North America.

Emerson, Misc., p. 222.

5. To overcome in a contest of any kind, as a battle, fight, game, debate, competition, or election; vanquish; conquer; overthrow; rout; beat: as, to defeat an army; to defeat an opposing candidate; to defeat one's opponent at chess.

For to draw the King on, it was given out that the Pope had defeated all Manfried's Forces. Baker, Chronicles, p. 58.
 —Syn. 5. Beat, Overpower, Overwhelm, Defeat, Discomfit, Rout, Overthrow, conquer. Beat is a general, somewhat indefinite, but vigorous word, covering the others. Overpower and overwhelm are the least creditable to the one that loses in the struggle; overpower is least permanent in its effects. To overpower is to overcome by superiority of strength or numbers, but the disadvantage may be changed by the arrival of reinforcements. To overwhelm is to bear down utterly, to sweep clear away by superior strength. Defeat is to overcome or get the better of in some kind of contest, and implies less discredit, but generally greater disaster, to the defeated party than beat, as that army is considered beaten which withdraws from the field. Defeat implies a serious disadvantage, because it applies more often to large numbers engaged. Discomfit has fallen into comparative disuse, except in its secondary sense of foiling, etc.; in that it expresses a comparatively complete and mortifying defeat. Rout is to defeat and drive off the field in confusion. Overthrow is the most decisive and final of these words; it naturally applies only to great persons, concerns, armies, etc. See conquer.

And though mine arms should conquer twenty worlds,
 There's a lean fellow beats all conquerors.
Danish, Old Fortunatus.

Our Conqueror whom I now
 Of force believe almighty, since no less Than such could have a conqueror's d' such force as ours.
Milton, P. L., I. 145.

There the companions of his fall, o'erwhelm'd
 With floods and whirlwinds of tempestuous fire,
 He soon discerns.
Milton, P. L., I. 78.

The earl of Northumberland and Hotspur defeated the Scots at Homildon, . . . and in that victory crowned the series of their services to Henry IV.]
Stubb, Const. Hist., § 307.
 Did the discomfited champions of Freedom fall?
Sumner, Speech against the Slave Power.

The armies of Charles were everywhere routed, his fastnesses stormed, his party humbled and subjugated.
Newcastle, Hallam's Const. Hist.

I have never yet been overthrown,
And thou hast overthrown me, and my pride
Is broken down, for Erid sees my fall.

Tennyson, Geraint

defibrination (dē-fi-brī-nā-shn), n. The act or process of defibrinating, or depriving of fibrin. defibrinate (dē-fi-brī-nāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. defibrinated, pp. defibrinating. [< de, priv. + fibrin + -ate.] To deprive of fibrin; specifdaily used of removing filth from fresh blood by whipping it with rods.

deficiency (dē-fish'gus), n. [See deficiency.] The state of being deficient; a deficiency. [Rare or obsolete.]

In this third part of learning, which is poetry, I can report no deficiency.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II. 144.

It would argue doubtless in the other party great deficiency and distrust of themselves, not to meet the force of his reason in any field whatsoever.

Milton, Epiconiastes, Pref.

deficiency (dē-fish'gus), n.; pl. deficiencies (-is). [Also deficiency; = Sp. Pg. deficiencia = It. deficienza, < ML. as if **deficientia*, < L. deficient (-t), deficient; see deficient.] 1. The state of being deficient; a lack or failing; a falling short; incompleteness, as of intelligence, attainments, or performance.

Marlborough was a man not only of the most idle and frivolous pursuits, but was so miserably ignorant, that his deficiencies made him the ridicule of his contemporaries.

Buckle, Civilization.

The deficiency in administration (of the U. S. government), aside from bad lawgivers, consists mainly in the lack of business order in public affairs. N. A. Rev., CXL 311.

2. That in which a person or thing is deficient; an imperfection.

The deficiency which causes colour-blindness cannot be supplied by any conceivable process. Tait, Light, § 16.

3. Lack of the necessary quantity, number, etc.; inadequacy; insufficiency: as, a deficiency of troops; a deficiency of blood.—4. Absence; loss. [Rare.]

Thou' thou wert scattered to the wind,
Yet is there plenty of the kind.
Who'll weep for thy deficiency?

Tennyson, Two Voices.

Deficiency Bill. See bill.—Deficiency of an algebraical curve. See curve.—General Deficiency Bill. See bill.—Syn. Insufficiency, scantiness, meagreness, scarcity, dearth. For comparison with defectiveness, see defectiveness.

deficient (dē-fish'gnt), a. [= F. déficient = Sp. Pg. It. deficiente, < L. deficient (-t), ppr. of deficere, lack, fail, be wanting; see defect.] 1. Lacking; wanting; incomplete.

Just as much as the love of God's law is deficient, must the fear of man's law be called in to supply its place.

H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 222.

2. Defective; imperfect; inadequate: as, deficient strength.

For nature so preposterously to err,
Being not deficient, blind, or lame of sense,
Hass witchcraft could not — Shak., Othello, I. 2.

3. Not having a full or adequate supply: as, the country is deficient in the means of carrying on war.—Deficient hyperbola, in math., a curve which meets the line at infinity at only one real point; a curve which has one and but one real asymptote, and which does not run off to infinity elsewhere. It is so called (first by Newton) as having but one asymptote instead of two. See hyperbola. Also called deficient hyperbola.—Deficient number, in arith., a number the sum of whose aliquot parts is less than the number itself: thus, 8 is a deficient number, as the sum of its aliquot parts, 1, 2, 4, is only 7.—Syn. Deficient, defective (see defective), insufficient, inadequate.

deficiently (dē-fish'gnt-ly), adv. In a deficient manner; insufficiently; inadequately.

deficientness (dē-fish'gnt-ness), n. The state of being deficient. [Rare.]

deficit (dē-fis'it), n. [= F. déficit = Sp. Pg. It. D. G. Dan. Sw. deficit, < L. deficit, it is wanting, 3d pers. sing. pres. ind. of deficere, be wanting; see deficient.] A failure or falling off in amount; specifically, a financial deficiency: as, a deficit in the taxes or revenue.

Squandering, and payment by loan, is no way to check a deficit.

Cervile, French Rev., I. III. 2.

Profuse expenditure, demanding more than could be got from crippled industry, had caused a chronic deficit.

H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 155.

defide, v. t. See defide.
de fide (dē fī'dē), n. [L., of faith: de, of; fide, abl. of fides, faith; see faiith.] Of the faith; authoritative; authentic.

The poorer classes are not, for the most part, even acquainted with the distinction between what is to be believed to be de fide and what is popularly taught them as truth.

Peep, Evangelion, p. 112.

defier (dē-fī'er), n. [Formerly also defies; < defy + -er. Cf. OF. defieur.] One who defies or dares. (a) A challenger: one who challenges another to combat or encounter. (b) One who acts in opposition or contempt: as, a defier of the laws.

He was ever

A loose and strong defier of all order.

Pletcher, Wildgoose Chase, I. 1.

disfigurement (dīs-fī-g'ur-ment), n. [Disfigure + -ment; equiv. to disfigurement.] A disfiguring; disfigurement.

Disfigurement and deformations of Christ.

Sp. Hall, Remains, p. 50.

On the pavement of the said chapel be these two stones as they are here disfigured.

Wesley, Ancient Funeral Monuments, p. 544.

By this [Labyrinth] disfigured they the perplexed life of man, combed and intangled with manifold mischiefs, one succeeding another.

Sandys, Travels, p. 80.

dislode (dē-fī-lōd'), v. t.; pret. and pp. disloded, ppr. disloding. [Cf. F. dislode, n., < dis-filer, protest from enfilade (q. v.), desfile: see desfile.] In fort., to arrange the plan and profile of (a fortification) so as to protect its lines from enfilading fire, and its interior from plunging or reverse fire. Also desfile.

disloding (dē-fī-lōd'ing), n. That branch of fortification the object of which is to determine the directions or heights of the lines of rampart or parapet, so that the interior of the work may not be incommoded by a fire directed to it from neighboring eminences. Also desloding.

desile<sup>1</sup> (dē-fī-l'), v. t.; pret. and pp. desiled, ppr. desiling. [Altered, in imitation of the simple verb desile, of same meaning, from ME. desoulen, mod. obs. desoul, desile, < L. de- + ME. foulen, make foul (whence mod. foul, v.), with parallel form sylen, whence mod. sle: see desoul, desoul.] 1. To make unclean, dirty, or impure; soil; befoul.

They that touch pitch will be desiled.
Shak., Much Ado, III. 2.

2. Figuratively, to sully or tarnish, as reputation, etc.

They shall desile thy brightness. Isak. xxviii. 7.

He is among the greatest prelates of the age, however his character may be desiled by dirty hands.

Swift, Lettice on the Sacramental Test.

3. To make ceremonially unclean.

That which dieth of itself, or is torn with beasts, he shall not eat, to desile himself therewith. Lev. xiii. 8.

He hath desiled the sanctuary of the Lord. Num. xix. 20.

4. To overcome the chastity of; debauch; violate; deflower.

Rhechem . . . lay with her, and desiled her.

Gen. xxxiv. 2.

5. To taint, in a moral sense; corrupt; vitiate; debauch; pollute.

Desile not yourselves with the idols of Egypt.

Isak. xx. 7.

God requires rather that we should die than desile ourselves with impieties.

—Syn. To contaminate, foul, stain, dirty. See taint, v. t.

desile<sup>2</sup> (dē-fī-l'), v.; pret. and pp. desiled, ppr. desiling. [= D. desilieren = G. desilieren = Dan. desilere = Sw. desilera, < OF. desiler, F. desiler (= Sp. Pg. desilar = It. desilare), desile off, desile, unravel, unstring, < de- + sil, spin threads, < sil, a thread, a file, rank, order: see file.] 1. Intrans. To march off in a line, or by files; file off.

The Turks desiled before the enemy. Gibbon.

The army did not desile into the plains around Malaga before the following morning.

Prescott, Ford and Isa., I. 12.

II. trans. In fort., same as deslade.

desile<sup>3</sup> (dē-fī-l' or dē-fī-l'), n. [Formerly also desilee; < F. désilé, a pass. desile, prop. pp. of desiler, desile: see desile.] 1. A narrow passage in a mountain region; a gorge through which a body of troops or other persons can pass in a file or narrow line.

He sent the guides in the advance, and putting spurs to his horse, dashed through a desile of the mountain.

Froding, Granada, p. 94.

2. A march by files.

It was a proud sight for Siena as she watched the desile through her narrow and embattled streets of band after band of the envoys of the towns that acknowledged her sway.

C. E. Norton, Church-building in Middle Ages, p. 100.

—Syn. 1. Gorge, ravine, etc. See sally.

desilement<sup>1</sup> (dē-fī-l'ment), n. [Cf. desile + -ment.] 1. The act of desiling, or the state of being desiled; foulness; uncleanness; impurity.

They are here, as at Mindanao, very superstitious in washing and cleansing themselves from desilements: and for that reason they delight to live near the Rivers or Streams of water. Dampier, Voyages, II. I. 127.

2. Corruption of morals, principles, or conduct; impurity; pollution by vice or sin.

The chaste cannot take into such silt without danger of desilement. Addison, Spectator, No. 260.

desilement<sup>2</sup> (dē-fī-l'ment), n. [Cf. F. désilement, < desiler, desile: see desile.] In fort., same as deslading.

desiler (dē-fī-l'er), n. One who or that which desiles; one who corrupts or debauches; one who or that which pollutes.

Thou bright desiler

Of Hymen's purest bed! Shak., T. of A., IV. 2.

desilation (dē-fī-l'ish'on), n. [Cf. L. de- + silare, a son, silia, a daughter, + E. -ation: see silation.] The abstraction of a child from its parents; the act of rendering childless. [Rare.]

The tales of fairy-spriting may shadow a lamentable verity, and the recovery of the young Montagu be but a solitary instance of good fortune out of many irreparable and hopeless desilations. Lamb, Chimney-Sweepers.

definable (dē-fī-n'g-bl), a. [Cf. define + -able.] Capable of being defined. (a) Susceptible of definition: as, definable words.

That Supreme Nature, which we cannot otherwise define than by saying it is infinite; as if infinite were definable, or infinitely a subject for our narrow understanding.

Dryden, Pref. to Religio Laici.

(b) Determinable; ascertainable: as, definable limits; a definable period.

Concerning the time of the end of the world, the question is whether that time be definable or no.

T. Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

definably (dē-fī-n'g-bl), adv. In a definable manner.

define (dē-fī-n'), v.; pret. and pp. defined, ppr. defining. [Cf. ME. definen, definen, < OF. definir, definir, definir, definir, define, limit, finish, end, etc., F. définir = Pr. definir, definir = Sp. Pg. definir = It. definire, definire = D. definieren = G. definieren = Dan. definere = Sw. definera, < L. definire, limit, settle, define, < de- + finire, set a limit, bound, end; see finish, and cf. definish.] 1. trans. 1. To determine, declare, or mark the limit of; circumscribe; determine or indicate the bounds or outlines of with precision; mark or set out clearly: as, to define the extent of a kingdom or country.

More and yet more defined the trunks appear,

Till the wild prospect stands distinct and clear.

Crabbe, Works, IV. 122.

The images of objects at different distances from the eye cannot be defined at the same time upon the retina.

Tyndall, Light and Elect., p. 42.

2. To fix, establish, or prescribe authoritatively: as, to define the duties of an officer.

Even had there been only one state, and not thirteen, it would probably have been found convenient to define the range of each of the powers of the commonwealth in a written document. E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 190.

3. To state the signification of; explain what is expressed by (a word, a phrase, etc.); state the nature or essential properties of: as, to define virtue; define your meaning more clearly.

Hard it is, through the bad expression of these Writers, to define this right, whether by Sea or Land.

Milton, Hist. Eng., v.

Like wit, much talked of, not to be defined. Osney.

He [Canon Kingsley] defines superstition to be an unreasoning fear of the unknown.

Dawson, Nature and the Bible, p. 216.

4. To determine; settle; decide.

These warlike Champions, all in armour shine,

Assembled were in field the challenge to define.

Spenser, F. Q., IV. III. 2.

II. intrans. 1. To determine; decide; give judgment.

The unjust judge . . . is the capital remover of landmarks, when he defineth aims of lands and properties.

Bacon, Judicature.

2. To state a definition.

defined (dē-fī-n'd'), p. a. Having the extent ascertained; having the precise limit marked, or having a determinate limit; definite.

No one had a defined portion of land or any certain bounds to his possessions.

Brougham.

definement (dē-fī-n'ment), n. [Cf. OF. definement, definition, finishing, accomplishment, < definir, definir, define: see define.] The act of defining or describing; definition.

Sir, his definement suffers no partition in you.

Shak., Hamlet, v. 2.

definer (dē-fī-n'er), n. One who defines, in any sense of that word.

Let your imperfect Definition show

That nothing you, the weak Definer, know

Prior, On Ex III. 14.

definish, v. t. [ME. definishen, < OF. definire, stem of certain parts of definir, define: see define, and cf. finish.] To define. Chaucer.

definita, n. Plural of definitum.

definite (def'i-nit), a. and n. [= OF. definit, F. definit = Sp. definito = Pg. l. definito, < L. definitus, limited, definite, pp. of definere, limit, define; see define.] I. a. 1. Having fixed limits; bounded with precision; determinate: as, definite dimensions; definite measure.

In the Bible, the highest heaven is certainly a definite place, where God's presence is specially manifested, although at the same time it pervades the whole universe. Dawson, Nature and the Bible, p. 39.

2. Expressly or precisely prescribed, fixed, or established.

It was too much the habit of English politicians to take it for granted that there was in India a known and definite constitution by which questions of this kind were to be decided. Narsley, Warren Hastings.

Before any definite agency for social control is developed, there exists a control arising partly from the public opinion of the living, and more largely from the public opinion of the dead. H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 467.

3. Having clear limits in signification; determinate; certain; precise: as, a definite word, term, or expression.—4. Fixed; determinate; exact.

Some certain and definite time. Ayliffe, Faregon.

A jar of water, if you shake it, has a perfectly definite time in which it oscillates, and that is very easily measured. W. K. Clifford, Lectures, I. 201.

5. In gram., defining; limiting: applied to the article the and its correspondents in other languages.—6. In bot.: (a) Of a constant number, not exceeding twenty: as, stamens definite. (b) Limited in development: as, a definite inflorescence. See centrifugal inflorescence, under centrifugal.—Definite proportions, in chem., the relative quantities in which bodies unite to form compounds. Also called combining proportions, chemical equivalents, or equivalents. See equivalent, and atomic theory, under atom.—Definite term, in logic, a term which defines or marks out a particular class of beings, or a single person, as distinguished from an indefinite term, which does not define or mark out an object.—Syn. Definite, Definitive, clear. The first two are sometimes confounded, especially in the adverbial form, and they often cover essentially the same idea. He spoke definitely—that is, with his meaning sharply defined; he answered definitively—that is, as to define or decide with certainty. Definite is passive, definitive active.

II. n. [ML. definitum, neut. of L. definitus, definite.] A thing defined. Ayliffe. [Rare or obsolete.]

definitely (def'i-nit-ly), adv. In a definite manner.

definiteness (def'i-nit-ness), n. The quality of being definite or defined in extent or signification; exactness; determinateness.

The right word is always a power, and communicates its definiteness to our action. George Eliot, Middlemarch, I. 330.

definition (def-i-nish'qn), n. [= OF. definition, definiō, F. définition = Sp. definición = Pg. definição = It. definizione = D. definitie = G. Dan. Sw. definition, < L. definitio (n-), a definition (tr. Gr. ὑπόθεσις, < ὑπόθεσις, define, limit: see hypothesis), < define, define: see define.] 1. The determination of the limits or outlines of a thing; a marking out; the state of being clearly marked out or outlined; specifically, in optics, the defining power of a lens—that is, its ability to give a clear, distinct image of an object in all its important details. This depends upon the freedom of the lens from spherical and chromatic aberration.

The day was clear, and every mound and peak traced its outline with perfect definition against the sky. O. W. Holmes, Old Vol. of Life, p. 255.

Of course, every one who is in the habit of using a telescope in the daytime is familiar with the fact, that on many seemingly cloudless days there is an otherwise invisible kind of haze, which impairs or destroys definition, and that the best or brightest vision is obtained in the blue sky visible between large, floating annuli. Science, IV. 94.

2. The act of stating the signification of a word or phrase, or the essential properties of a thing.

Definition is so closely connected with classification that, until the nature of the latter process is in some measure understood, the former cannot be discussed to much purpose. J. S. Mill, Logic, I. viii. § 1.

Enthusiastically attached to the name of liberty, these historians troubled themselves little about its definition. Macaulay, History.

3. A statement of the signification of a word or phrase, or of what is essential to the conception of any given thing; an explanation of how any given kind is distinguished from all other kinds.

Three conceptions of the nature of definition have prevailed at different times: (1) Aristotle taught that every strict definition consists of two parts, different in kind, one declaring the genus or higher class to which the species defined belongs, the other declaring the specific difference by which the given species differs from others of the same genus. This view influences most of the definitions of systematic botany and zoology. (2) The theory of logical extension and comprehension, coming into vogue on the overthrow of Aristotelianism and obtaining its extreme development in the formal logic of Kant and his followers, made the definition a mere list of essential marks all standing upon one footing and aggregated together without any distinction between genus and difference. This, being an extremely nominalistic view, answers very well for the definitions of some artificial classes in mathematics, etc. (3) Modern logicians, recognizing that the elements of a definition are neither, in general, merely joined together without order nor always combined on one fixed model, conceive the definition to be an explanation of the construction of the concept to be defined out of others better known. According to the two first views alike, some concepts are indefinable because so abstract that no wider ones embracing them can be found; according to the third, no concept can be too abstract to admit of definition, the only indefinable ideas being such as the sensation of redness, the sense of fear, and the like, which direct experience alone can impart. An example of definitions conforming to the third conception is: "An uncle is the son of a parent of a parent"—a definition in which the notions of son and parent neither stand in the relation of genus and difference nor are merely aggregated together. Such also is the definition "Substance is the permanent element in the phenomenon."

Though definitions will serve to explain the names of substances as they stand for our ideas, yet they leave them not without great imperfection as they stand for things. Locke, Human Understanding, III. xi. 24.

Abundant definition, a definition which specifies characters which might be omitted without widening the class of things to which the definition applies.—Accidental definition, a description.—Adequate definition or mark, a definition which applies to every individual of the class defined, and to no other.—Analytical definition, a definition expressing an analysis of a notion already formed, and embodied in a word or phrase already in use.—Causal definition. See causal.—Circle in definition. See circle.—Conceptual definition, the analysis of a concept; the exact setting forth of the contents of a notion.—Descriptive definition, a definition which designates the thing defined by means of inessential attributes.—Essential definition, a strict definition stating the true constitutive essence of the definitum.—Nominal definition, an explanation of the meaning of a word.—Real definition, the statement of the design or idea of a real kind. Thus, any artificial object, as a sewing-machine, is defined by stating the purpose and the nature of the contrivance by which the purpose is intended to be attained. The real definition of a natural species supposes the species to owe its being to some intelligible idea which the definition attempts to state.—Synthetical definition, a definition expressing the mode of constructing a new conception; a definition for a new term therein proposed, or for a new sense proposed for an old word.

definitional (def-i-nish'qn-ly), a. [F. definition + -al.] 1. Of or pertaining to definition; used in defining.

Two distinct presentations are necessary to the comparison that is here implied; but we cannot begin with such definitional differentiation: we must first recognize our objects before we can compare them. J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX. 49.

2. Abounding in definitions.

definitive (dē-fin'i-tiv), a. and n. [= F. definitif = Sp. Pg. It. definitivo = D. definitief = G. Dan. Sw. definitiv, < L. definitivus, definitive, explanatory, L.L. definitus, < definitus, pp. of definere, define: see define.] I. a. 1. Limiting the extent; determinate; positive; express: as, a definitive term.

Other authors often write dubiously, even in matters wherein is expected a strict and definitive truth. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err.

I had been subject to attacks of the singular disorder which physicians have agreed to term cataplexy, in default of a more definitive title. Poe, Tales, I. 332.

2. Ending; determining; final; conclusive: opposed to conditional, provisional, or interlocutory.

My lord, you know it is in vain; For the Queen's sentence is definitive, And we must see 't performed. Haywood, If You Know not Me, I.

With the four volumes first mentioned the Goethe Society in Weimar begins the publication of the definitive edition of Goethe's works. Amer. Jour. Philol., VIII. 484.

They [treaties] may be principal or accessory, preliminary or definitive. Woolsey, Intro. to Inter. Law, § 102.

Specifically—(a) In bot., completely formed; fixed and finished: opposed to primitive or formative: as, the definitive ovule; a definitive anther. Hensley. (b) In logic, applied to a judgment which is accompanied by a full assent of the mind.

To these two methods Galen addeth the third method, that is, method divisive or definitive. Blunderdell.

3. In metaph., having position without occupying space.

Definitive and circumscriptive—the distinction whereby theologians, that deny God to be in any place, save themselves from being accused of saying that he is nowhere. Hobbes.

Definitive location, in metaph., position without extension in space.—Definitive whole, the compound of a generic character and a specific difference; a metaphysical whole.—Syn. See definitive.

II. n. In gram., a defining or limiting word, as an article, a demonstrative, or the like.

definitively (dē-fin'i-tiv-ly), adv. 1. Determinately; positively; expressly.

deflect

Definitively then I answer you. Shak., Rich. III., III. 7.

The strong and decided policy to which Republicans throughout the country had definitively committed themselves. The American, IX. 343.

2. Finally; conclusively: as, the points between the parties are definitively settled.

No man, no synod, no session of men, though call'd the church, can judge definitively the sense of Scripture to another man's conscience. Milton, Civil Power.

3. So as to have or exist in a definitive location (which see, under definitive).

definitiveness (dē-fin'i-tiv-ness), n. Determinateness; conclusiveness; conclusiveness.

At length I would be avenged: this was a point definitively settled—but the very definitiveness with which it was resolved precluded the idea of risk. Poe, Tales, I. 345.

definitude (dē-fin'i-tūd), n. [L. as if "definitudo," < definitus, definite: see definite.] Definiteness; exactitude; precision.

Though thus destitute of the light and definitude of mathematical representations, philosophy is allowed no adequate language of its own. Sir W. Hamilton.

definitum (def-i-ni'tum), n.; pl. definita (-tā). [ML.] A thing defined. See definite, n.

defix (dē-fiks'), v. t. [L. defixus, pp. of defigere, fasten down, fix, < de, down, + figere, fasten: see fix.] To fix; fasten.

The country parson is generally sad [sober] because he knows nothing but the cross of Christ, his mind being defixed on and with those nails wherewith his Master was. G. Herbert, Country Parson, xvii.

deflagrability (def'lā-grā-bil'i-ti), n. [F. deflagrable: see blasty.] In chem., combustibility; the quality of taking fire and burning away.

We have been forced to spend much more time than the opinion of the ready deflagrability (if I may so speak) of saltpetre did beforehand permit us to imagine. Boyle, Works, I. 302.

deflagrable (def'lā- or dē-fā-grā-bl), a. [L. as if "deflagrabilis," < deflagrare, burn: see deflagrate.] Combustible; having the quality of taking fire and burning up, as alcohol, oils, etc.

Our chemical oils, supposing that they were exactly pure, yet . . . they would be . . . but the more inflammable and deflagrable. Boyle, Works, I. 333.

deflagrate (def'lā-grāt), v.; pret. and pp. deflagrated, ppr. deflagrating. [L. deflagratus, pp. of deflagrare, burn, consume, < de + flagrare, burn: see flagrant.] I. trans. To set fire to; burn; consume: as, to deflagrate oil or spirit.

A secondary condenser is always used for spectroscopic experiments, as the spark has great deflagrating power. J. E. H. Gordon, Elect. and Mag., II. 53.

II. intrans. To burn; burst into flame; specifically, to burn rapidly, with a sudden evolution of flame and vapor, as a mixture of charcoal and niter thrown into a red-hot crucible. Deflagrating mixtures, combustible mixtures, generally made with niter, the oxygen of which is the active ingredient in promoting their combustion.

deflagration (def-lā-grā'shon), n. [= F. déflagration = Sp. deflagración = Pg. deflagração = It. deflagrazione, < L. deflagratio (n-), < deflagrare, burn up: see deflagrate.] A kindling or setting on fire; burning; combustion. Specifically—(a) Oxidation by the rapid combustion of a substance, attended with an extremely sudden evolution of flame and vapor. It is accomplished by mixing the substance with potassium chlorate or nitrate (niter), and projecting the mixture in small portions at a time into a red-hot crucible. (b) The rapid combustion of metals by the electric spark.

deflagrator (def'lā-grā-tor), n. [= F. déflagrateur = Sp. deflagrador, < NL. deflagrator, < L. deflagrare, burn up: see deflagrate.] An instrument for producing combustion, particularly the combustion of metallic substances by means of the electric spark.—Barre's deflagrator, a voltaic cell in which the copper and zinc plates are large and are wound closely together in a spiral form, and hence offer large surface and proportionally small internal resistance. It can, therefore, produce powerful heating effects in a short external circuit.

deflate (dē-flāt'), v. t. [F. déflater, < de + flatus. Cf. inflate.] To remove the air from: the opposite of inflate. [Recent.]

deflation (dē-flā'shon), n. The act of deflating. [Recent.]

deflect (dē-flekt'), v. [= F. défléchir, < L. deflectere, bend aside, < de, away, + flectere, bend: see flex, flexible.] I. trans. To cause to turn aside; turn or bend from a right line or a regular course.

Since the Glacial Epoch there have been no changes in the physical geography of the earth sufficient to deflect the Pole half-a-dozen miles, far less half-a-dozen degrees. J. Croft, Climate and Cosmology, § 2.

The foreign policy of the Tory party was hardly more deflected by disastrous events than that of their adversaries.

Locky, Eng. in 18th Cent., I.

A beam is always deflected, whatever be the load it supports.

R. Z. Bell, Expt. Mechanism, p. 128.

Deflecting magnet. See magnet.

II. Intrans. To turn away or aside; deviate from a true course or a right line; swerve.

At some part of the Arcus it [the needle] deflecteth not, but lieth in the true meridian.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., II. 2.

All those actions which deflect and err from the order of this end are unnatural and inordinate.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1836), I. 7.

His suicide . . . is in no respect an unaccountable circumstance, or one which need cause us to deflect from the line of ordinary analysis.

Poe, Tales, I. 241.

deflected (dē-flek'ted), p. a. Turned aside or from a direct line or course; specifically, in bot. and zool., bent abruptly downward.

deflection (dē-flek'shən), n. [Prop. but less commonly spelled deflexion; = F. deflexion = Pg. deflexio = It. deflessione, < LL. deflexio(n)-, a bending aside, < L. deflexus, pp. of deflectere, bend aside: see deflect.] 1. The act of turning or the state of being turned aside from a straight line or course; a turning from a true line or the regular course; deviation.

Needles . . . at the very line . . . stand without deflection.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., II. 2.

They traverse even the largest faults, and cross from one group of rocks into another without interruption or deflection.

Geikie, Geol. Sketches, II. 23.

2. Figuratively, deviation from the right, regular, or expected course of action or thought; aberration.

I find no sufficient or competent collection of the works of nature which have a digression and deflection from the ordinary course.

Baron, Advancement of Learning, II. 121.

King David found out the deflection and indirectness of our minds.

W. Montague, Devoutess Essay, I. 112.

Specifically—3. Naut., the deviation of a ship from her true course in sailing.—4. In optics, a deviation of the rays of light toward the surface of an opaque body; inflection. See diffraction.

The deflections which the rays proceeding from any point experience are proportional to the distances of the points of incidence from the axis of the mirror.

Loomis, Light (trans.), p. 54.

5. In elect., the deviation or swing of a magnetic needle from the zero of its position: often measured in degrees.—6. In math.: (a) The distance by which a curve departs from another curve, or from a straight line. (b) Any effect either of curvature or of discontinuous change of direction.—7. In mech., the bending of material under a transverse strain, as of a beam under the weight of a load.—8. In entom.: (a) The state of being bent downward: as, a deflection of the side of the pronotum. (b) A deflected part or margin.

deflective (dē-flek'tiv), a. [< deflect + -ive.] Causing deflection or deviation.—Deflective forces, in mech., those forces which act upon a moving body in a direction different from that in which it actually moves, in consequence of which it is made to deviate from its course.

deflectometer (dē-flek'tom-ē-tēr), n. [Irreg. < L. deflectere, deflect, + metrum, a measure.] An instrument for measuring the deflection of a rail by a weight in rapid motion. E. H. Knight.

deflector (dē-flek'tor), n. [< deflect + -or.] 1. A plate, diaphragm, or cone in a lamp, furnace, or stove, to bring the flame and gases into intimate contact and improve the combustion. E. H. Knight.—2. A device for causing the nose of a hydraulic mining machine to move in any desired direction.

deflex (dē-flek's), v. t. [< L. deflexus, pp. of deflectere, turn aside: see deflect.] To turn aside; deflect; specifically, in zool., to bend down.

I have noticed that the smaller species, during flight, deflex the extremity of their antennæ.

Westwood.

deflexed (dē-flek'ted), p. a. [< deflex + -ed.] Deflected; specifically, in zool., bent down: as, a deflexed margin.—Deflexed antennæ, antennæ which have the apical portion constantly bent downward, as in many Diptera.—Deflexed wings, wings which, in repose, cover the body like a roof, the internal edges of the primaries meeting and the surfaces sloping down on both sides, as in many moths and Hemiptera.

deflexion, n. See deflection.

deflexure (dē-flek'shūr), n. [< deflex + -ure: see flexure.] A turning aside or bending; deviation.

deflorate (dē-flō'rāt), a. [= F. deflorat = Sp. deflorado = Pg. deflorado = It. deflorato, < LL. defloratus, pp. of deflorare, deprive of flowers, deflower: see deflower.] In bot.: (a) Having lost its flowers: said of a plant. (b) Having shed its pollen: said of an anther. defloration (dē-flō'rā'shən), n. [= F. deflorationem = Sp. defloracion = Pg. defloracio = It. deflorazione, < LL. defloratio(n)-, < deflorare, deflower: see deflorate.] 1. The act of deflowering; the act of depriving of the flower.—2. A selection of the flower or most valuable part of anything.

The laws of Normandy are, in a great measure, the defloration of the English laws.

Sir M. Hale.

3. The act of depriving of virginity; ravishment; rape.

deflower, v. t. See deflower.

deflowt (dē-flō't), v. t. [< L. de, down, + E. flow, after L. defluere, flow down. See de- and flow, and cf. fluant, defluent.] To flow down.

Some superficial matter deflowing from the body.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., III. 4.

deflower, deflower (dē-flō'ér, dē-flō'úr), v. t. [< ME. deflowren, defloren, < OF. deflorir, deflorir, deflower, deflower, F. deflorer = Pr. deflorar = Sp. deflorar = Pg. deflorar = It. deflorare, < LL. deflorare, deprive of flowers, deflower, < de- priv. + flor (flor), a flower: see flower and flour.] 1. To deprive or strip of flowers, or of the qualities or character of a flower.

Reeking the cedars, deflowering the gardens.

W. Montague, Devoutess Essay, I. xix. § 6.

Thrice had he pierced his target in the eye At fifty paces; twice deflowered a rose, Striking each time the very leaf he chose.

A. H. Stoddard, Skork and Baby.

Hence—2. To despoil of beauty or grace; spoil the appearance or nature of; damage; vitiate.

Now grisly Hair deflowers his polish'd Skin, Shewing what he to Karys is of kin.

J. Beaumont, Pychoe, II. 171.

He died . . . before the sweetness of his soul was deflowered.

Jer. Taylor.

3. To deprive of virginity; ravish; violate. deflowerer (dē-flō'ér-ér), n. One who deflowers. Sp. Balc.

defluency (dē-flū-ēn-si), n. [< defluent: see defluent, and cf. fluency.] Fluidity; flow.

The cold having taken away the defluency of the oil . . . there appeared cylinders consisting partly of concreted oil.

Boyle, Hist. of Cold, xxi.

defluent (dē-flū-ēnt), a. [< L. defluens (-tis), pp. of defluere, flow down, < de, down, + fluere, flow: see fluant.] Running downward; decurrent: specifically used in botany.

defluous (dē-flū-ūs), a. [< L. defluens, flowing down, < defluere, flow down: see defluent.] Flowing down; falling off. Bailey.

defluvium (dē-flū-vi-um), n. [< L., a flowing down, a falling off, < defluere, flow down: see defluent.] A falling off, as of the hair or the bark of a tree, from disease.

deflux (dē-flūks), n. [= Sp. deflugo = Pg. deflugo = It. deflugo, < LL. deflucus, a flowing down or off, < L. defluere, pp. deflucus, flow down or off: see defluent.] A flowing down; a running downward.

All impostumes engendered either by way of gathering and collection of humors, or by some deflux and rheumatic descent.

Holland, tr. of Pliny, xxii. 25.

defluxion (dē-flūks'zhən), n. [= F. defluxion = Pg. deflusion, < LL. deflusion (-is), < L. defluere, pp. deflucus, flow down: see deflux, defluent.] In med., a flowing, running, or falling of humors or fluid matter from an upper to a lower part of the body; a discharge or flowing off of humors: as, a defluxion from the nose or head in catarrh: sometimes used as synonymous with inflammation, from the increased flow of blood (hyperemia) to an inflamed part.

Home, and there find my wife making of tea; a drink which Mr. Pelling, the Pottery, tells her is good for her cold and defluxions.

Pope, Diary, III. 175.

I have been much impaired in my health, by a defluxion which fell into one of my legs, caused by a slight scratch on my shin-bone.

Swalm, To Mr. Wotton.

defly, adv. A corrupt form of defly.

defoliation, n. See defoliation.

defoliate, v. t. [< F. defouiller (cf. Sp. deshojar = Pg. desfolhar = It. desfogliare, < *ML. *desfoliare*, < ML. defoliare, deprive of leaves: see defoliate and foliate.] To strip the leaves from.

Over and beside, in disburdening and defoliating a vine, you must beware how you pick off those boughs that are like to bear the grapes, or to go with it.

Holland, tr. of Pliny, xvii. 22.

defoliate, v. t. [< ME. defolien, var. of defolien, < OF. defolier, etc.: see defoliate.] To trample under foot.

defoliate, n. [< ME. < defoliat, v.] A trampling under foot.

There was fighting, there was toils, And under horn knights defoliate.

Arthur and Merlin, I. 799.

defoliate (dē-flō'li-āt), v. t.; pret. and pp. defoliated, ppr. defoliating. [< ML. defoliatus, pp. of defoliare, shed leaves, < L. de- priv. + folium, a leaf: see foliate.] To deprive of leaves; cut or pick off the leaves of.

The swarms of more robust May beetles (Leachnosterma fusca), which begin to defoliate oak groves and poplar trees.

Science, IV. 567.

defoliate (dē-flō'li-āt), a. [< ML. defoliatus, pp.: see the verb.] Deprived of leaves; having cast its leaves.

defoliation (dē-flō'li-āt'shən), n. [= F. defoliationem (cf. Pg. desfolhacio), < *ML. *defoliatio(n)-*, < defoliare, defoliate: see defoliate.] Loss of leaves, as by the depredations of insects; specifically, the fall of leaves in autumn.

The fallation and defoliation of trees.

Nature, XXX. 554.

defoliator (dē-flō'li-āt-ōr), n. [= Sp. deshojador = Pg. desfolhador; as defoliate + -or.] That which defoliates or strips of verdure; specifically, in entom., an insect which destroys the leaves of trees.

deforce (dē-fōrs'), v. t.; pret. and pp. deforced, ppr. deforcing. [< OF. deforcier, deforcier, deforcier, deforcier, < ML. deforcicare, deforcicare, take away by violence, < dis- (OF. des-, de-) + for (> OF. foris), force: see force.] In law: (a) To withhold from or keep out of lawful possession, as of an estate.

Putting and establishing armed men in townes, castles, and other places to defend the land against him, to deforce him of his fee.

Holmes, Edw. I., as. 1295.

(b) In Scots law, to resist (an officer of the law in the execution of his official duty).

The herald was evil entreated in the execution of his summons, and was manifestly deforced, and his letters riven.

Pitcairne, Chron. of Scotland (ed. 1765), p. 127.

deforce (dē-fōrs'), n. Deforcement.

deforcement (dē-fōrs'mēt), n. [< OF. deforcement (cf. ML. deforcamentum), < deforcere, deforce: see deforce and ment.] In law: (a) The withholding of lands or tenements to which another person has a right. It implies that the latter has not had possession.

Keeping a man . . . out of a freehold office is construed to be a deforcement.

Blackstone, Com., III. 10.

(b) In Scots law, a resisting of an officer engaged in the execution of the law.

deforcitor (dē-fōr's-tōr), n. [Also written deforcator, deforcator; < OF. deforcier, < deforcere, deforce.] An obsolete form of deforciant.

deforciant (dē-fōr'shānt), n. [< OF. deforciant, ppr. of deforcere, deforce: see deforce.] In law: (a) One who keeps out of possession the rightful owner of an estate. (b) A person against whom a fictitious action was brought in fine and recovery: abolished by 3 and 4 Wm. IV., c. 74.

In levying a fine of lands, the person against whom the fictitious action is brought upon a supposed breach of covenant is called the deforciant.

Blackstone, Com., III. 10.

deforestation (dē-fōr-ē'shən), n. [*< ML. as if *deforestationem*, < deforcicare, deforce: see deforce.] In law, a distress; a seizure of goods for the satisfaction of a lawful debt.

deforest (dē-fōr'est), v. t. [< de- priv. + forest. Cf. disforest.] To deprive of forests; cut down and clear away the forests of.

The settlement of the country and general deforesting of such a large portion of it have driven these hawks to more retired parts during the nesting-season.

Pap. Sci. No., XXVIII. 642.

deforestation (dē-fōr-ē'shən), n. [< deforest + -ation.] The act of cutting down and clearing away the forests of a region or a tract of land.

Reasons may be assigned for the decreased fertility: for instance, drought resulting from the decay of irrigation-works, or from reckless deforestation, and the production of marshes from the want of river-levees.

Pap. Sci. No., XIII. 292.

deform<sup>1</sup> (dē-fōrm'), v. t. [< ME. deformen, deformen, < OF. deformar, F. deformar = Sp. Pg. deformar = It. deformare, deformare, < L. deformare, put out of shape, disfigure, < de- priv. + forma, shape: see form.] 1. To change or alter the form of; convert into a new form or shape.

One of the above forms [of knot] cannot be deformed into a circle.

Encyc. Brit., XIV. 127.

Specifically—2. To mar the natural form or shape of; put out of shape; disfigure, as by malformation of a limb or some other part of the body.

A traveller, one so made out of the mixture of shreds of forms, that himself is truly deformed.

B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, II. 1

Whose work is without labour, whose designs
No flaw deformis, no difficulty thwarts,
And whose beneficence no charge exhausts

Couper, Task, vi. 229.

The propensity to deform, or alter from the natural form of some part of the body, is one which is common to human nature in every aspect in which we are acquainted with it.

W. H. Flower, Fashion in Deformity, p. 1.

8. To render ugly, ungraceful, or displeasing; mar the beauty of; spoil: as, to deform the person by unbecoming dress; to deform the character by vicious conduct.

Old men with dust deformed their hoary hair. Dryden.

Fury will deform the finest Face.

Congress, tr. of Ovid's Art of Love.

Our prose had at length worked itself clear from those quaint conceits which still deformed almost every metrical composition.

Maccusley, Dryden.

deform<sup>1</sup> (dê-fôr'm'), v. t. [ME. deformare, < OF. deformo, F. difforme = Sp. Pg. deformo = It. difforme, < L. deformis, a., deformed, < de-priv. + forma, shape: see deform, v.] Disfigured; being of an unnatural, distorted, or disproportioned form; displeasing to the eye.

Sight so deform what heart of rock could long

Deformed [L. deformata] by letters in stanzas.

Wyclif, 2 Cor. iii. 7.

deformability (dê-fôr-ma-bil'i-ti), n. [< deformable: see -bility.] Capacity for change of form; pliability.

Preliminary to deformability and elasticity.

Nature, XXXVII. 164.

deformable (dê-fôr-ma-bl'), a. [< deform<sup>1</sup> + -able.] Capable of being deformed; capable of change of form.

deformate, a. [ME., < L. deformatus, pp. of deformare, deform: see deform<sup>1</sup>, v.] Deformed.

And when she saw her visage so deformate,
If she in hart were wo, I ne wite, God wate.

B. Taylor, Lands of the Saracen, p. 123.

There is no doubt that many savage races as we at present see them are actually degenerate, and are descended from ancestors possessed of a relatively elaborate civilization.

E. B. Lanbester, Degeneration, p. 66.

3. Characterized by or associated with degeneracy; unworthy; debased; applied to inanimate objects.

Such men as live in these degenerate days.

Pope.

In comparison with the great orators and authors of the past, we have fallen on degenerate times.

J. Chubb.

Degenerate form of an algebraic locus, a locus of any order or class consisting of an aggregation of lower forms. Thus, two straight lines form a degenerate conic.

degenerately (dē-jen'g-rāt-lī), adv. In a degenerate or debased manner; unworthily.

That blindness worse than this,
That saw not how degenerately I served

Milton, B. A., l. 412.

degenerateness (dē-jen'g-rāt-nēs), n. A degenerate state; a state in which natural or original qualities are decayed or lost.

degeneration (dē-jen'g-rā'ahn), n. [= F. dégénération = Sp. degeneración = Pg. degeneração = It. degenerazione, < L. as if **degeneratio* (n-), < degenerare, degenerate.] 1. A loss or impairment of the qualities peculiar to the race or kind, or to a type; reduction to a lower type in some scale of being.

The hypothesis of Degeneration will, I believe, be found to render most valuable service in pointing out the true relationships of animals which are a puzzle and a mystery when we use only and exclusively the hypothesis of Balance, or the hypothesis of Elaboration.

E. R. Lankester, Degeneration, p. 30.

And now to inquire briefly what is meant by degeneration. It means literally an unkindling, the undoing of a kind, and in this sense was first used to express the change of kind without regard to whether the change was to perfect or to degrade, but it is now used exclusively to denote a change from a higher to a lower kind: that is to say, from a more complex to a less complex organization; it is a process of dissolution, the opposite of that process of involution which is pre-essential to evolution.

Huxley, Body and Will, p. 240.

Specifically—2. Loss or impairment of natural or proper qualities; descent to an inferior state; the act of becoming or the state of having become inferior, especially with respect to moral qualities.—3. In physiol., any process by which a tissue or substance becomes replaced by some other regarded as less highly organized, less complex in composition, of inferior physiological rank, or less suited for the performance of its original functions. Quain, Med. Dict., p. 334.

Degeneration may be defined as a gradual change of the structure in which the organism becomes adapted to less varied and less complex conditions of life.

E. R. Lankester, Degeneration, p. 32.

4. A degenerate animal or plant; an organism of a degraded type. [Rare.]

Those grains which generally arise among corn, as cockle, arcaus, erglops, and other degenerations.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., III. 17.

Albuminoid degeneration, albuminous degeneration. Same as lardaceous degeneration.—Amyloid degeneration. See lardaceous disease, under lardaceous.—Calcareous degeneration, a morbid disturbance in the nutrition of a tissue, resulting in the deposition in it of salts of lime.—Cancerous degeneration, cancer degeneration. See cancer.—Colloid degeneration. See colloid.—Fatty degeneration, in pathol. the conversion of protein elements into a granular fatty matter. As a morbid process, this occurs most frequently in the muscles of the heart, in the walls of capillaries, and in the urinary tubules; but it may affect any part of the body.—Fibroid degeneration, the conversion of a tissue into one of fibrous structure, or the substitution of a form of connective tissue for some other tissue.—Granular degeneration. Same as cloudy swelling (which see, under cloudy).—Hypothesis of degeneration, the hypothesis that certain organisms manifesting an inferior grade of structural and physiological characteristics are the degenerate descendants of higher forms. The theory makes the degeneration chiefly the result of disease of parts; thus, the octopuses are descendants from quadrupeds, and have assumed the fish-like form and lost their hind limbs in better accommodating themselves to aquatic life, the small-winged and flightless birds are descendants from those with well-developed wings, on account of residence in places where they were not much disturbed, have failed to exercise their wings, and finally lost the use of them, and they have aborted; the intestinal worms without an intestine are descendants from those with an intestine, but on account of their environments the skin has assumed the function of a nutrient medium and the intestine has been lost.—Lardaceous degeneration. Same as lardaceous disease (which see, under lardaceous).—Mucoid degeneration, the conversion of cells or intercellular substance into a semifluid translucent substance containing much.—Paraneurymatous degeneration. Same as cloudy swelling (which see, under cloudy).—Pigmentary degeneration, disturbance of the nutrition of a part, with deposition of pigment.—Wallerian degeneration, the degeneration of nerve-fibers which have been separated, as by section of a nerve, from certain ganglia which exercise a nutritive influence on them.

degenerationist (dē-jen'g-rā'shōn-ist), n. and a. [**degeneration* + -ist.] 1. n. One who advocates the theory of degeneration; one who believes that the general tendency of organized beings, especially of man in his mental and moral life, is to degenerate; one who maintains that the natural course of civilization is downward rather than upward.

With regard to the opinions of older writers on early civilization, whether progressionists or degenerationists, it must be borne in mind that the evidence at their disposal fell far short of even the miserably imperfect data now accessible.

E. R. Tylor, Prim. Culture, l. 48.

II. a. Pertaining to the theory of degeneration.

The two works of Sir John Lubbock and Mr. Tylor, respectively, appear to us to agree as to the main issues of which they treat, both authors being able opponents of the doctrines which Mr. Tylor has styled degenerationist.

London (London).

degenerative (dē-jen'g-rā-tiv), a. [**degeneration* + -ive.] Tending to degenerate; of the nature of degeneration.

We were able to note some slight degenerative process in the gray substance. Tr. in Allen and Neurol., VIII. 196.

degenerated (dē-jen'g-rād), a. [Ascom. form of degenerate, with (E.) -ēd = (L.) -at.] Cf. degender, v. Degenerate.

Yet of religion a degender'd seed Industrious nature in each heart had sown.

Shilving, Dooms-day, The Fifth Hour.

degenerescence (dē-jen'g-rēs'ens), n. Same as degeneration.

degenerisist (dē-jen'g-ris), v. t. [As degenerous + -ise.] To degenerate; become degenerated.

Degeneris'd, deraid, and withered night.

Sylvestre, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, II, The Vocation.

degenerous (dē-jen'g-rus), a. [**OF. degenerous*, degenerous, with added suffix (E.) -ous, < L. degener, ignoble, degenerated: see degender.] Degenerate.

I am thy handy-work, thy creature, Lord,
Stamp'd with thy glorious image, and at first
Most like to thee, though now a poor accurst, Convicted califf and degenerous creature.

Quarles, Emblems, III. 10.

degenerously (dē-jen'g-rus-lī), adv. In a degenerate manner; basely; meanly.

How wounding a spectacle is it to see our greatest heroes, like Hercules at the distaff, thus degenerously employed!

Doddy of Christian Prety.

degerminator (dē-jēr'mi-nā-tōr), n. [NL., < L. de + germen (germin-), germ. Cf. F. dégermer, extract the germ.] In milling, a machine consisting essentially of two corrugated disks of iron, one fixed and the other revolving, between which wheat is passed to split the grains and extract the germs.

degesti, a. [Appar. < L. digestus, pp. of digestere, arrange, dispose, digest: see digest.] Grave; composed. Jamieson.

Furth held the stout and degest Auletes.

Gavin Douglas, Virgil, p. 231.

degestly, adv. [**degest* + -ly.] Gravely; composedly; deliberately. Jamieson.

Agit Alethes, that na wyndome wantit,
Not bairn was ripe in counselle and in yeris,
Unto thir wordis degestly maid answeris

Gavin Douglas, Virgil, p. 234.

degger (deg'ēr), n. One who degs or sprinkles. degging-machine (deg'ing-mā-shēn'), n. [**degging*, verbal n. of deg, sprinkle, < machin.] A sprinkling-machine used in calendering cotton.

deglase, v. and n. See deguise. deglasse (dē-glās'), v. t.; pret. and pp. deglased, ppr. deglasing. [**de* + priv. + glasse.] To remove the glaze from.

deglory (dē-glō'ri), v. t.; pret. and pp. degloried, ppr. deglorying. [**de* + priv. + glory. Cf. disglory, n.] To disgrace; dishonor.

His head

That was before with thorns degloried.

G. Fletcher, Christ's Triumph.

deglube (dē-glōb'), v. t. [**L. deglubere*, peel off, < de, off, + glube, peel.] To skin; peel.

Now enter his taxing and deglubing face.

Cleveland, Poems (1851). (E. D.)

Deglutibores (dē-glō-bi-tō'rēs), n. pl. [NL., < L. deglubere, peel off: see deglube.] In Macgillivray's system of classification, the third order of birds; the hawks or coraciiform birds. It included the hawks and hawks, the tanagers, and the American blackbirds, and was therefore equivalent to the families now recognized as Fringillidae, Tanagridae, and Icteridae. See kuhr. [Not in use.]

deglutinate (dē-glō'ti-nāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. deglutinated, ppr. deglutinating. [**L. deglutinus*, pp. of deglutire (> F. deglutiner), unglue, < de + priv. + glutinare, glue, < gluten, glue: see gluten, glue.] 1. To unglue; loosen or separate by or as if by ungluing.

See, see, my Boole (ah, hark! how it doth crack!)

The Hand of Outrage that deglutinates

His Vesture, gl'd with gore-blood to His back.

Dante, Holy Roods, p. 14.

2. To deprive of gluten; extract the gluten from.

deglutition (deg-lō'tish'ōn), n. [= F. deglutition = Pg. deglutido = It. deglutizione (cf. Sp. deglutición), < LL. **deglutitio* (n-), < deglutire, swallow down, < de, down, + glutire, swallow: see glut.] The act or power of swallowing.

The tongue serves not only for feeding, but also to assist the mastication of the meat and deglutition.

Ray, Works of Creation, II.

Muscles of deglutition, those muscles which are employed in the act of swallowing; the muscles of the tongue, palate, and pharynx.

deglutitious (deg-lō'tish'us), a. Pertaining to deglutition. [Rare.]

deglutitive (dē-glō'ti-tiv), a. [As deglutitio + -ive.] Pertaining to deglutition; concerned in the act of swallowing; deglutitious; deglutitory.

deglutitory (dē-glō'ti-tō-ri), a. [As deglutitio + -ory.] Serving for deglutition.

deglycerin (dē-glīs'g-rin), v. t. [**de* + priv. + glycerin.] To free from glycerin.

The French process, so largely adopted in America, for deglycerating neutral fats before they are saponified.

W. L. Carpenter, Soap and Candles, p. 151.

degorder (deg'ōr-dēr), n. [Irreg. < deg (see) + order.] The pair of numbers signifying the degree and order of any mathematical form.

degote (dē-gōt'), n. [Russ. degot, birch-tar.] Oil of birch, obtained from the white birch by a process of dry distillation. It is used to give to Russian leather its peculiar odor, and to perfume imitations of it. Also called elachert. Less correctly written degut, degut.

degouted, a. [So. degoutit, < OF. degouté, deguité, spotted (cf. degouter, degoutier, drop, drop down), < L. de + guttatus, spotted, < gutta, a drop, spot: see guttate.] Spotted.

A mantill

Degoutit with the self in spotted black.

King's Quair, v. 10.

degradation (deg-rā-dā'ahn), n. [= F. dégradation = Pr. degradado = Sp. degradación = Pg. degradação = It. degradazione = D. degradatie = G. Dan. Sw. degradation, < ML. degradatio (n-), a reducing in rank, < degradare: see degrade.] 1. A reducing in rank; the act of depriving one of a degree of honor, of dignity, or of rank; deposition, removal, or dismissal from rank or office: as, the degradation of a general. Specifically—(a) In eccl. law, the act of depriving an ecclesiastic of his orders or privileges, or of both. The Roman Catholic Church recognizes two methods of degradation. By the simple or verbal degradation the accused is deprived of all his orders and benefices. By the solemn or real degradation he is with great ceremony stripped of his ecclesiastical vestments and ornaments and publicly reproached by the bishop, deprived of his orders and benefices as in simple degradation, and of his various privileges. He remains, however, a priest, and can in special emergencies consecrate and administer the sacraments. Degradation is now resorted to only in extreme cases. In the early church the culprit was degraded by removal from a higher to a lower grade of office. (b) The act of depriving a person of his degree in a university. (c) In early American colleges, when the students' names were arranged according to the social rank of the parents, the placing of a name, as a punishment, lower than it would otherwise be placed. B. H. Hall. (d) In the University of Cambridge, England, the postponement of a student's candidacy for a degree, etc., for one year, owing to illness or other unavoidable cause. (e) In the University of Oxford, the solemn cancelling in convocation of the degree held by a member of the university.

2. The state of being reduced from a higher to a lower grade of power, character, or estimation; degeneracy; debasement.

Deplorable is the degradation of our nature. South.

The descent of Spain, once the first among monarchies, to the lower depths of degradation, the elevation of Holland, in spite of many natural disadvantages, to a position such as no commonwealth has ever reached, teach the same lesson [the tendency of Papal domination].

Manning.

3. The act of sinking to a lower level in space. [Rare.]

Lycius has sunk on one knee and with closed eyes is about to slip prone. Lamia leans over and supports his head from further degradation, while her left hand comforts his shoulder.

The Century, XXXI. 248.

4. Diminution or reduction, as of strength, value, altitude, or magnitude.—5. In painting, a lessening and obscuring of distant objects in a landscape, to give the effect of distance.—6. In geol., the reduction or wearing down of higher lands, rocks, strata, etc., by the action of water or other causes.

They [Scottish geologists] appealed to the vast quantity of sedimentary rocks . . . bearing witness in every bed and layer to the degradation and removal of former continents.

Gilrie, Geol. Sketches, II. 50.

7. In biol., abortive structural development; retrograde metamorphosis, such as that witnessed in many parasites as a result of their parasitism.

The degradation of the species man is observed in some of his varieties. Dant.

The course of development may, in particular cases, lead to numerous retrogradations, so that we may find the adult animal to be of lower organization than the larva. This phenomenon, which is known as retrogressive metamorphosis, corresponds to the demands of the species.

theory, since under more simple conditions of life, where asceticism is more easily obtained (perennialism), degradation and even the loss of parts may be of advantage to the organism.

Claus, Zoology (trans.), 1. 155.

8. In bot., a change consisting of abstraction, loss, abortion, or non-development of usual organs.—9. In her., same as abatement.—Degradation of energy. See energy.—Syn. 1 and 2. Debatement, abatement, violation, depression, disgrace, dishonor, humiliation.

degradational (deg-rē-dā'shon-pl), a. [< degradation + -al.] In nat. hist., due to degradation; lowered in type through degradation; degenerated: as, a degradational form; degradational structures.

degrade (dē-grād'), v.; pret. and pp. degraded, ppr. degrading. [< ME. degraden, < OF. degrader, F. dégrader = Pr. degradar, degradar = Sp. Pg. degradar = It. degradare = D. degradieren = G. degradiren = Dan. degradere = Sw. degradera, < ML. degradare, reduce in rank, deprive of rank, < L. de, down, + gradus, step, degree, rank; see grade and degree.] 1. trans. 1. To reduce from a higher to a lower rank, degree, or type. Specifically—2. To deprive of any office or dignity; strip of honors: as, to degrade a general officer.

When you disgrac'd me in my ambassade,
Then I degraded you from being king.
Shak., 8 Hen. VI., iv. 3.

Both which have been degraded in the senate,
And must have their disgraces still new rubbed
To make them smart, and labour of revenge.
B. Jonson, Catiline, l. 1.

Frynne was sentenced by the Star Chamber court to be degraded from the bar.
Fahey.

8. To lower in character; cause to deteriorate; lessen the value or worth of; debase: as, drunkenness degrades a man to the level of a beast.

Nor shalt thou, by descending to assume Man's nature, lessen or degrade thine own.
Milton, P. L., iii. 304.

Shall we lose our privilege, our charter,
And wilfully degrade ourselves of reason
And piety, to live like beasts?
Shirley, Love's Cruelty, II. 2.

In the progress of moral truth, the animal passions which degrade our nature are by degrees checked and subdued.
Sumner, Orations, I. 174.

4. In biol.: (a) To reduce in taxonomic rank; lower in the scale of classification: as, to degrade an order to the rank of a family. (b) To reduce in complexity of structure or function; simplify morphologically or physiologically: as, an organism degraded by parasitic habit.

The degree to which many of the most important organs in these degraded (cleistogamic) flowers have been reduced, or even wholly obliterated, is one of their most remarkable peculiarities, reminding us of many parasitic animals.
Darwin, Different Forms of Flowers, p. 330.

5. In geol., to reduce in altitude or magnitude, as hills and mountains or icebergs; wear down, as by the weather.

Although the ridge is still there, the ridge itself has been degraded.
Journal of Science.

The regions within reach of abrading and degrading agencies were therefore of sufficient extent for the needed Paleozoic sediment-making.
Amer. Jour. Sci., 3d ser., XXIX. 228.

6. In optics, to lower in position in the spectrum; increase the wave-length of (a ray of light), and hence diminish (its) refrangibility, as by the action of a fluorescent substance. See fluorescence.—7. To diminish the strength, purity, also, etc., of.

Degrading the brilliancy of dyed stuffs, or the purity of whites.
Worship Receipts, 1st ser., p. 330.

—Syn. 1 and 2. Debase, Disgrace, etc. (see above); to dishonor, break, cashier, reduce to inferior rank.—3. To lower, sink, impair, injure, pervert, pollute. See list under debase.

II. *trans. 1. In nat. hist., to degenerate in type; pass from a higher type of structure to a lower.—2. To degenerate; become lower in character; deteriorate.

No doubt vast eddies in the flood
Of onward time shall yet be made,
And thronged races may degrade.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, cxviii.

8. In a university, to take, for some particular reason, a lower degree than one is entitled to, or to avoid taking a degree at the proper or usual time; descend from a higher to a lower degree.

Degrading, or going back a year, is not allowed, except in cases of illness (proved by a doctor's certificate). A man degrading for any other reason cannot go out afterwards in Honors. C. A. Bristol, English University, p. 126, note.

degraded (dē-grād'), p. a. 1. Reduced in rank; deprived of an office or a dignity.—2. Lowered in character or value; debased; low.

The Netherlands . . . were reduced practically to a very degraded position.
Medley.

8. In biol., reduced in taxonomic rank, or in complexity of structure or function; brought to or being in a state of degradation.

Skulls of the very meanest and most degraded type.
Ferraz, Language, iv.

The Protosoa are the most degraded in organization.
Seiner, IV. 172.

4. In her., placed upon steps. Also degraded.—Over degraded and conjoined. See class.

degradation (dē-grād'mēt), n. [< OF. degradation, F. dégradation (= It. degradamento), < degrader, degrade; see degrade.] Deprivation of rank or office. [Rare.]

So the words of Ridley at his degradation, and his letter to Hooper, expressly show.
Milton, Reformation in Eng., II.

degrading (dē-grād'ing), p. a. 1. Dishonoring; debasing; disgraceful: as, degrading obsequiousness.

The inordinate love of money and of fame are base and degrading passions.
Wirt.

2. Lowering; bringing to a lower level; wearing down.—Degrading causes, in geol., those causes which contribute to the dissolving and wearing down of the elevated parts of the earth's surface, and the carrying of these parts down into lower levels, as atmospheric influences and the action of rivers and of the ocean.

degradingly (dē-grād'ing-ly), adv. In a degrading manner, or in a way to depreciate.

This is what Bishop degradingly calls virtue and precise duty.

degras (de-grā'), n. [F.] Wool-grease.

degraver (deg-rā-vāt'), v. t. [< L. degradare, make heavy, weigh down, < de, down, + gravis, heavy; see grave.] To make heavy; burden.
Bailey, 1727.

degravation (deg-rā-vā'shon), n. [*< L. as if *degravatio(n), < degradare, make heavy, weigh down; see degrade.*] The act of making heavy.

degrease (dē-grēs'), v. t.; pret. and pp. degreased, ppr. degreasing. [< de-priv. + grease, after F. dégraisser.] To remove the grease from, as from bones in preparing skeletons, or from feathers or hair in preparing skins. [Rare.]

degree (dē-grē'), n. [< ME. degre, degree, < OF. degre, degret, F. degré = Pr. degret = Pg. degrado, a degree, step, rank, < L. de, down, + gradus, a step, etc.; see grade and gradus. Cf. degrade.]

1. A step, as of a stair; a stair, or set of steps.

Round was the s.hap, in manere of compass,
Full of degrees, the heighte of sixty paces,
That when a man was set on o degre,
He lette nought his fellewe for to see.
Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 1033.

It is made with Stages and hath Degrees aboute, that every Man may wel see, and non greve other.
Mandelville, Travels, p. 17.

But when he once attaine the utmost round,
He then unto the ladder turns his back,
Looks in the clouds, scorning the base degrees
By which he did ascend.
Shak., J. C., II. 1.

2. A step or single movement toward an end; one of a series of advances; a stage of progress; a phase of development, transformation, or progressive modification.

We have feet to scale and climb
By slow degrees, by more and more,
The cloudy summits of our time.
Longfellow, Ladder of St. Augustine.

Specifically—3. In gram., one of the three stages, namely, positive, comparative, and superlative, in the comparison of an adjective or an adverb. See comparison, 5.—4. The point of advancement reached; relative position attained; grade; rank; station; order; quality.

Thence the karver or sever most amare every dishe in his degre.

He should ascribe, fro degre into degre,
Vn-to know wherens he descendyd is,
Duke, Erie, or Baron, or marketh if he be.
Rom. of Perceval (R. E. T. S.), l. 112.

Great indeed
His name, and high was his degre in heaven.

5. In universities and colleges, an academical rank conferred by a diploma, originally giving the right to teach. The earliest degree was that of master, which in the university of Bologna, and others modeled on that (as were the faculties of law in all the old universities), was called the degree of doctor. Afterward the lower degree of determinant (later called bachelor) was introduced, and the intermediate degree of licentiate; but these were not regular degrees, except in the faculty of arts. The degree of bachelor was conferred by the "nation" of the faculty of arts; the others were given by the chancellor, by authority of the pope. Thus, the medieval degrees were: (1) the degree of determinant, or bachelor of arts, without a diploma; (2) the licentiate; (3) the degree of master of arts; (4) the degree of master of doctor of theology; (5) the degree of master or doctor of medicine; (6) the degree of doctor of laws. The degrees now usually conferred are bachelor, master, and doctor: as, bachelor of arts, divinity, music, or law; master of arts; doctor of divinity, law, medicine, philosophy, music, etc.

He [Wolsey] was born at Ipswich in Suffolk, the Son of a Butcher, sent to Oxford by Reason of his Pregnancy of Wit, so soon, that taking there the first Degree of Art, he was called the Boy Butcher. Baker, (Chronicles, p. 261.

The Universities ceased to teach the systematic theology of the Schools, and the systematic jurisprudence of the Decretals; and the ancient degrees of bachelor and doctor of the canon law are known, except during the reign of Mary, no more.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 219.

6. In geneal., a certain distance or remove in the line of descent, determining the proximity of blood: as, a relation in the third or fourth degree. See first extract, and forbidden degrees, below.

In the canon law, degrees of relationship is reckoned by the number of steps from the person farthest from the common ancestor to him; in the civil law, by the number of steps from one person up to the common ancestor and down to the other. Thus, a grand-uncle is related to his grand-nephew in the third degree by the canon law, in the fourth degree by the civil.

She was as familiar as a cousin; but as a distant one—a cousin who had been brought up to observe degrees.
H. James, Jr., Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 242.

7. In alg., the rank of an equation, as determined by the highest power under which an unknown quantity appears in it. Thus, if the exponent of the highest power of the unknown quantity be 3 or 4, the equation is of the third or fourth degree.

8. One of a number of subdivisions of something extended in space or time. Specifically—(a) One of a number of equal subdivisions on the scale of a meteorological or other instrument, as a thermometer. (b) A unit for measuring circular arcs and the angles subtended by them at their centers, being the 360th part of a circumference, or the 90th part of a right angle. Considered as angular magnitudes, all degrees are equal; considered as lengths of arcs, they are directly proportional to the radii of the circles of which they are parts. This manner of dividing the circle originated with the Babylonians about 3000 B. C., and was brought into use in Greece by the mathematician Hipparchus. It was perhaps in its origin connected with an opinion that the year consisted of 360 days. The common abbreviation or sign for "degrees" is a small circle (°) placed to the right of the top of the last figure of the number of them: as, 45°. The degree is subdivided into 60 minutes, and the minute into 60 seconds. The length of a degree of latitude is the length of an arc of the section of the figure of the sea-level by a meridian, the difference of latitude between the extremities of this arc being one degree. (See latitude.) It is 69.703 statute miles at the equator, and 69.160 at the poles. The length of a degree of longitude is the length of an arc of the section of the figure of the sea-level by a plane parallel to the equator, the difference of longitude between the extremities of this arc being one degree. This is nearly proportional to the cosine of the latitude, and is equal to 69.16 statute miles at the equator.

(c) In arith., three figures taken together in numeration: thus, the number 270,380 consists of two degrees (more commonly called periods). (d) In music. (1) One of the lines or spaces of the staff, upon which notes are placed. Notes on the same degree, when affected by accidentals, may denote different tones, as D, D♯, and D♭; and, similarly, notes on different degrees, as D♯ and E♭, may denote identical tones, at least upon instruments of fixed intonation. (2) The difference or step between a line and the adjacent space on the staff (or vice versa). Occasionally, through the use of accidentals, this difference is only apparent (see above). (3) The difference, interval, or step between any tone of the scale and the tone next above or below it, as from do to re, from re to fa. The interval may be a whole step or tone, a half step or semitone, or (in the minor scale) a step and a half, or augmented tone. See step, tone, interval, staff, scale. (To distinguish between degrees of the staff and degrees of the scale, the terms staff-degrees and scale-degrees are sometimes used.)

9. Intensive quantity; the proportion in which any quality is possessed; measure; extent; grade.

Chronicle degree, one 360th part of a tropical year. — Conjunct degree. See conjunct. — Degree out. See cut. — Degree of a curve, the same as its order, but the latter term is preferable. — Degree of constraint. See constraint. — Degree of freedom. See freedom. — Discrete degrees. See discrete. — Forbidden or prohibited degrees, in civil and in canon law, degrees of consanguinity and affinity within which marriage is not allowed. The determination of these in church or canon law was founded on the prohibitions contained in Lev. xviii., with adherence to the principle that a degree of relationship which bars marriage in one sex bars it equally in the other, and that by Christ's declaration (Matt. xix. 6 and Mark x. 2, confirming Gen. ii. 24) a man and his wife become one flesh. The Roman law prohibited nearly the same degrees, though marriage of a man with his niece was permitted from the time of Claudius until forbidden by Nerva, and also from the time of Caracalla to that of Constantine. Marriages with a deceased brother's wife and a deceased wife's sister were forbidden by Constantine. Theodosius the Great forbade them between first cousins, and this was the general rule of the church from that time on. From the sixth to the thirteenth century, marriages within the seventh degree were prohibited; after the fourth Lateran Council (A. D. 1215), only those within the fourth degree. Marriage between godparents and godchildren was prohibited by Justinian, and this was afterward extended to include the parents of the children, and later still other relations of these. The present for confirmation was put on a par with the godparents. The Council of Trent limited such spiritual relationship to sponsors, to presenters at confirmation, to the persons baptized or confirmed, and the parents of them. In England marriage between first cousins was forbidden till the Reformation. The present English law of both church and state is conformed to a statute passed under Henry VIII., and revised under Elizabeth, which forbids all marriages not without the Levitical degrees. These degrees were tabulated by Archbishop Parker in 1583, and his table is adopted in the 96th canon of 1603, and ordered to be set up publicly in every church. It will also be found printed at the end of every English prayer-book. Its provisions have been summarized as follows: A man may not marry the mother or stepmother of his own or his wife's parents; the widow of his father, father-in-law, uncle, brother, son, stepson, or nephew; the aunt, sister, daughter, or niece of himself or his wife; the daughter or stepdaughter of his own or his wife's children. A woman may not marry the father or stepfather of her own or her husband's parents; the widower of her mother, mother-in-law, aunt, sister, daughter, stepdaughter, or niece; the uncle, brother, son, or nephew of herself or her husband; the son or stepson of her own or her husband's children. Marriage with a deceased wife's sister, whether expressly forbidden by the Mosaic law or not, is prohibited as precisely analogous to that with a deceased husband's brother, the marriage of a man with his brother's wife being explicitly prohibited in Lev. xviii. Direct relationship, if in the ascending and descending line, is canonically reckoned as one degree, and marriage prohibited accordingly. In canon law an illicit connection is held to involve the same prohibitions as a marriage. — In degree, greatly; to a degree.

He was grieved in degree.

And greatly moved in mynde.

Local degree, one 360th part of the solid. — Simoon's degree, a certain early medieval degree, conjectured to have been one of bachelor, and to have been conferred upon masters in the University of Oxford. The real meaning of the phrase has been forgotten; but down to 1327 every master of arts, inceptor in medicine, etc., in Oxford was compelled to swear hatred of Simoon and renunciation of his degree. — Song of degrees, a title given to fifteen psalms, from cxx. to cxxv., inclusive. Biblical criticism are not agreed as to the origin and significance of the title. See gradual psalms, under gradual. — To a degree, to an extreme; exceedingly; as, proud to a degree. [Colloq.]

deguise, v. and n. See deguise.

déhaché (dē-ha-shē'), a. [F. (in her), pp. of OF. déhacher, déhachier, cut off, de-priv. + hacher, cut; see hack, hach.] In her, having the head, paws, and tuft of the tail cut off: said of a beast used as a bearing. Encyc. Brit., XI. 698.

déhiscé (dē-his'), v. t.; pret. and pp. déhiscéd, ppr. déhiscing. [= It. deiscere, L. dehiscere, gape, open, de, off, + hiscere, gape, yawn, akin to hurr, yawn; see hiatus and yawn.] To gape; specifically, in bot., to open, as the capsules of plants.

This [a legume or pod] is a superior, one-celled, one- or many-seeded fruit, déhiscing by both ventral and dorsal sutures, so as to form two valves.

R. Bentley, Manual of Botany, p. 204.

The anthers déhiscéd properly, but the pollen-grains adhered in a mass to them.

Darwin, Different Forms of Flowers, p. 232.

déhiscence (dē-his'ens), n. [= F. déhiscence = It. deiscenza, L. dehiscencia, L. dehiscere(-t)s, déhiscé; see déhiscé.] 1. A gaping. — 2. In bot., the opening of a pericarp for the discharge of the seeds, or of an anther to set free the pollen. Regular déhiscence in the case of capsules is septoidé, through the septa, or loculoidé, directly into the cells. It is also said to be septifragé when the valves break away from the septa. Irregular déhiscence may be transverse, circumscissile, etc., or variously lacerated. The déhiscence of an anther is by longitudinal slits, valves, pores, etc.

The déhiscence of the firm external envelope.

W. E. Carpenter, Micros., § 297. Déhiscé Seed-vessel or Allicia.

3. In pathol., a bursting open.

déhiscé (dē-his'gnt), a. [= F. déhiscé, L. dehiscere(-t)s, ppr. of déhiscere, gape; see déhiscé.] 1. Opening, as the capsule of a plant.

— 2. In entom., divergent at the tips, as if tending to split apart; said especially of the elytra when they are separated at the apices.

déhonestaté, v. t. [L. dehonestatus, pp. of déhonestare, dishonor, disgrace, de-priv. + honestare, honor, honestus, honorable, honest; see honest, and cf. déhonest, v.] To impugn; dishonor.

The excellent and wise pains he took in this particular, no man can déhonestate or reproach.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1825), II. 74.

déhonestation, n. [L. dehonestatio(n), L. dehonestare, dishonor; see déhonestate.] A disgracing; a dishonoring.

Who can expatiate the infinite shame, déhonestation, and infamy which they bring? Bp. Gauden, Hieraspistes, p. 482.

déhors (dē-hōr'; F. pron. dē-ōr'), a. and n. [F. déhors, OF. dāfors, dāfors, dāfors, dāfuors, dāfuor, dāfuor = Pr. dāfors = Sp. dāfuera, ML. dāfors, outside, without, L. de, from, + foris, foras (> OF. foris, foris, foris, foris, foris), out of doors, out, foris, a door, = Gr. θύρα = AS. dūrw = E. door: see door, and forum, foreign, foris, etc.] I. a. If the wasting of our money might not déhort us, yet the wounding of our minds should deterre us.

Lyly, Euphues, Anat. of Wit, p. 108.

The bold Galliean, St. Peter, took the boldness to déhort his Master from so great an infelicity.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1825), I. 297.

déhortation (dē-hōr-tā'shən), n. [L. dēhortatio(n), L. dēhortari, dissuade; see déhort.] Dissuasion; advice or counsel to the contrary of some act or undertaking.

Déhortations from the use of strong liquors have been the favourite topic of sober declaimers in all ages. Lamb.

The exhortation, which might almost be termed a déhortation for its severity, was ordered to follow the sermon in case of need. K. W. Dixon, Hist. Church of Eng., xv.

déhortatory (dē-hōr-tā-tō-ri'), a. and n. [L. dēhortatorius, L. dēhortari, dissuade; see déhort.] I. a. Dissuasive; belonging to dissuasion.

The text [Eph. iv. 20] you see is a déhortatory charge to avoid the offence of God. Bp. Hall, Hamana, p. 108.

II. n. A dissuasion; a dissuasive argument or reason. Milton.

déhorter (dē-hōr'tér), n. A dissuader; one who advises to the contrary.

So long as he [Caryl] was merely an exhorter or déhorter, we were thankful for such eloquence, such humor, such vivid or grotesque images, and such splendor of illustration, as only he could give.

Lowell, Study Windows, p. 127.

déhumanisation (dē-hū-mān-iz-ā'shən), n. [L. dehumanisatio + -ation.] The act of dehumanising, or the state of being dehumanised. Also spelled déhumanisation.

Nature has put a limit to déhumanisation in the qualities which she exacts in order that the combination of two individuals to produce a third may take place at all.

Maudsley, Body and Will, p. 245.

déhumanise (dē-hū-mān-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. déhumanised, ppr. déhumanising. [de-priv. + humanise. Cf. F. déhumaniser.] To deprive of distinctively human qualities: as, déhumanising influences; déhumanised speculation. Also spelled déhumanize.

The grosser passions, originally conspicuous and carefully ministered to by devotes, gradually fade, leaving only the passions less related to corporeal satisfactions; and eventually these, too, become partially déhumanised. H. Spencer, Pop. Sci. Mo., XXIV. 348.

déhuské (dē-husk'), v. t. [de-priv. + husk.] To deprive of the husk.

deiformity (dē-i-fōrm-i-tē), n. [< deiform + -ity.] 1. The quality of being deiform or godlike.

Thus the soul's numerous plurality
I have prov'd, and show'd she is not very God;
But yet a decent deiformity Hath given her.

Dr. H. More, Infinity of Worlds, st. 27.

2. Conformity to the divine character or will. The short and secure way to union and deiformity being faithfully performed.

Spiritual Conquest.

deify (dē'i-fī), v. t.; pret. and pp. deified, ppr. deifying. [< ME. deifien, < OF. deifier, F. deifier = Sp. Pg. deifoor = It. deifoor, < L. deus, a god, + -ficare, < facere, make.] 1. To make a god of; exalt to the rank of a deity; enroll among the gods.

The seals of Julius Caesar . . . have the star of Venus over them, . . . as a note that he was deified. Dryden.

2. To regard as an object of worship; adore or worship as a deity.

He did . . . extol and deify the pope. Bacon.

Persuade the covetous man not to deify his money, and the proud man not to adore himself. South.

3. To make godlike; exalt spiritually.

By our own spirits we are deified. Wordsworth.

deign (dēn), v. t. [< ME. deignen, deynen, deynen, < OF. deigner, deigner, deigner, F. deigner = Pr. denhar = Sp. deintest, deintest, n. and a. Obsolete forms of dainty. Chaucer.

deintegrat (dē-in'tē-grāt), v. t. [< LL. deintegrare, pp. of deintegrare, < de-priv. + integrare, make whole: see integrate.] To disintegrate.

deintestest, a. See daintiest.

deintest, n. A Scotch and obsolete English form of dainty.

deintest, n. See daintest.

Deipara (dē-i-pā-rā), n. [= Sp. Pg. It. Deipara, < L. deipara, fem. adj.: see deiparous.] The Mother of God; the Theotocos: a title of the Virgin Mary. See Theotocos.

deiparous (dē-i-pā-rus), a. [< L. deipara, fem. adj., < L. deus, a god, + parere, bear, bring forth.] Bearing or bringing forth a god: an epithet applied to the Virgin Mary. Bailey.

Deipnosophist (dē-nōs'fist), n. [< Gr. deipnosophistēs, sing. of deipnosophistai, Deipnosophists, the name of a work of Athenæus (see the def.), lit. 'the learned men at dinner,' < deipnos, dinner, + sophistēs, a learned man: see sophist.] One who converses learnedly at dinner: in allusion to the title (see the etymology) of a celebrated work of Athenæus, in which a number of learned men are represented as at dinner discoursing on literature and matters of the table.

The eye is the only note-book of the true poet; but a patchwork of second-hand memories is a laborious scribble, hard to unite and harder to read, with about as much nature in it as a dialogue of the Deipnosophists.

Lowell, Study Windows, p. 222.

deirrhaine, n. [Ir.] See deirrhaine.

deist, n. A Middle English form of deist.

deism (dē'izm), n. [< F. deisme = Sp. Pg. It. deismo = D. G. deismus = Dan. deisme = Sw. deism, < NL. deismus, < L. Deus, God, + -ismus, E. -ism.] 1. The doctrine that God is distinct and separated from the world. See deist, 1. — 2. Belief in the existence of a personal God, accompanied with the denial of revelation and of the authority of the Christian church. Deism is opposed to atheism, or the denial of any God; to pantheism, which denies or ignores the personality of God; to theism, which believes not only in a God, but in his living relations with his creatures; and to Christianity, which adds a belief in a historical manifestation of God, as recorded in the Bible.

deist (dē'ist), n. [< F. deiste (Viret, 1538), now deiste = Sp. Pg. It. deista = D. G. Dan. Sw. deist; < NL. deista, < L. Deus, God, + -ista, E. -ist.] 1. One who believes in the existence of a personal God, but in few or none of the more special doctrines of the Christian religion; one who holds to some of the more general propositions of the Christian faith concerning the Deity, but denies revelation and the authority of the church. The name in this sense is particularly appropriated to a group of English writers, mostly of the first half of the eighteenth century. See free-thinker.

A man who, on the account of the obscurity of Holy Writ, shall pretend to reject the christian religion, and turn deist, must, upon the same account, reject deism too, and turn atheist.

2. One who holds the opinion that there is a God, but no divine providence governing the affairs of men; one who holds that God is not only distinct from the world, but also separated from it.

Those who admit a transcendental theology are called Deists, those who admit a natural theology Theists. The former admit that we may know the existence of an original being by mere reason, but that our concept of it is transcendental only, as of a being which possesses all reality, but a reality that cannot be further determined. The latter maintain that reason is capable of determining that object more accurately in analogy with nature: namely, as a being which, through understanding and freedom, contains within itself the original ground of all other things.

Kant, Critique of Pure Reason, tr. by Muller.

— Syn. Atheist, Skeptic, etc. See atheist.

deistic (dē-is'tik), a. [< deist + -ic.] Pertaining to deism or to deists; of the nature of deism; embracing or containing deism: as, a deistic writer; a deistic book.

deistical (dē-is'ti-kal), a. Same as deistic.

This very doctrine [that man is by nature wicked] . . . has made the deistical moralists almost unanimous in proclaiming the divinity of Nature, and setting up its fancied dictates as an authoritative rule of action.

N. A. Rev., CXX. 422.

deistically (dē-is'ti-kal-i), adv. In a deistic manner.

deisticalness (dē-i'st-i-kal-ness), n. The character of being deistical; deism. [Rare.]
deistate (dē-i'stāt), a. [Irreg. < L. deista (t)-s, deity, + -ate.] Possessing the nature of God; divine; deified.

One person and one Christ who is God incarnate, and man deistate, as Gregory Nazianzen saith, without mutation.
Cressmer, To Bp. Gardiner

Deiters's cells. See cell.

deity (dē-i'ti), n.; pl. deities (-tiz). [ME. deite, deyte, < OF. deite, < Fr. deité = Pr. deitat = Sp. deidad = Pg. deidade = It. deità, < L.L. deita (t)-s (for classical L. divinitas (t)-s, divinity), the divine nature, < L. deus (> F. dieu = Pr. deus, deus = Sp. dios = Pg. deos = It. dio), a god, God. The L. deus (whence also E. deify, deify, deism, deist, and prob. deuce, q. v.) is one of a large group of words whose forms and etymological and mythological relations are somewhat involved. The principal L. words of the group are: (1) L. deus, earlier dios (pl. dī, dī, dat. and abl. pl. diis, diis, in inscriptions also dīūs, dīūs, gen. pl. dīōm, dīōm; later nom. pl. dei, gen. pl. deorum), orig. **dīūs*, a god; cf. Skt. deva, heavenly, as n. a god, = Zend dāeva, an evil spirit, = Lith. deiva, a god; Gael. and Ir. dia, God, = OW. Din, W. duw, God, = Isel. ðen, a god; prob. not connected with Gr. deōs, a god (whence E. theism, theist, atheism, atheist, thearchy, theodicy, theology, etc.). (2) L. diūs, often dīūs (= Gr. dios or **diōs*, divine), adj. to deus; hence L. diūnus, divine (see divine); cf. Skt. dāruv, divine, devya, heavenly; L. diūus, diūs, adj., as n. a god. (3) OL. Diōnia, later Jovis (nom. rare; gen. Jovis, etc.), Jove, Jupiter (see Jove, Jupiter), = Gr. Ζεύς, Beotian Διεύς, for **Διεύς* (gen. Διός for **Διός*), Zeus (see Zeus), = Skt. dyāus (gen. dhras, stem di-), the sky, heaven, day, personified Heaven; the same in combination, OL. Joviter, L. Jupiter, Juppiter, in another form Dispiter, = Gr. voc. Ζεύς πάτερ = Skt. voc. Dyāush pitar, lit. Heaven Father; = *OTent. *Tiw*, in OHG. Zio = AS. Tve = Isel. Týr, the Teutonic god of battle; the AS. Tve is still preserved in E. Tuesday, AH. Twes day (see Tue and Tuesday). (4) L. diēs, a day, orig. **diēs*, **diōs*; cf. Skt. dyāus (stem di-), day (the same as dyāus, the sky, etc., above), Armenian tiv, Ir. dia = W. dyw, day; see diel, diurnal, journal, journey. (5), etc.: For other L. deity names from the same root, see Diana, Janus, Juno, and Ius. Cf. also demon.] 1. Godhead; divinity; the attributes of a god; especially, the nature and essence of the one Supreme Being.

For what reason could the same deity be dealed unto Laurentia and Flora which was given to Venus? Raleigh

No spake the Father: and, unfolding bright Toward the right hand his glory, on the Son Blazed forth unclouded day. Milton, P. L., x. 66.

2. [cop.] God; the Supreme Being, or infinite self-existing Spirit: regularly with the definite article.

An Atheist's laugh's a poor exchange For Deity offended!
Burns, Epistle to a Young Friend.

I seem . . . to see the benevolence of the Deity more clearly in the pleasures of my young children than in anything else in the world. Paley, Moral Philos., ii. 5.

3. A god; a divinity; a being to whom a divine or godlike nature is attributed; an object or a person worshipped as a god.

Even Buddha himself is not worshipped as a deity, or as a still existent agent of benevolence and power. He is merely revered as a glorified remembrance.
Sir J. E. Tennant, Ceylon, iv. 11.

deject (dē-jekt'), v. t. [= OF. dejector, dejector, dejecter, < F. dejecter = Pr. dejectar, < L. dejectus, pp. of deicere, deicere, cast down, < de, down, + jacere, cast, throw: see jet, and cf. abject, adject, coniect, eject, etc.] 1. To cast or throw down; direct downward.

In nothing water hem deject,
 So lette hem nothing lounge type swete.
 The Austrian colours he doth here deject

Sometimes she dejects her eyes in a seeming civility; and many mistake in her a cunning for a modest look.
Fuller, Profane State, i.

2. To abate; lower; diminish in force or amount.

Ere long she was able, though in strength exceedingly dejected, to call home her wandering senses.
Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, iii.

3. To depress the spirits of; dispirit; discourage; dishearten: now chiefly in the past participle used adjectively. See dejected.

In the midst of all my endeavours, there is but one thought that dejects me.

Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, ii. 2.

Nor think to die dejects my lofty mind.

Pope, R. of the L., v. 99.

-Syn. 2. To sadden, make despondent, afflict, grieve.
deject (dē-jekt'), a. [OF. deject = Sp. dejecto = It. dejecto, < L. dejectus, pp.: see the verb.] Downcast; low-spirited; wretched; dejected.

And I, of ladies must deject and wretched,
 That suck'd the honey of his music vows,
 Now see that noble and most sovereign reason,
 Like sweet bells jangled, out of tune and harsh.

dejecta (dē-jek'tā), n. pl. [L., neut. pl. of dejectus, pp. of deicere, deicere, thrown down: see deject.] Excerements.

Luke iv. 18.

9. Acquittal of a prisoner by the verdict of a jury.—3. Parturition; childbirth; delivery.

In the labour of women it helpeth to the easy deliverance.

Beacon.

Hence—4. The act of disburdening of anything; especially, the act of disburdening the mind by uttering one's thoughts.

Assume that you are saying precisely that which all think, and in the flow of wit and love roll out your paradoxes in solid column, with not the infirmity of a doubt. So at least shall you get an adequate deliverance.

Emerson, Essays, 1st ser., p. 217.

5. The act of giving or transferring from one to another.—6. Utterance; declaration; also, a particular statement, especially of opinion; specifically, an authoritative or official utterance by speech or writing; a decision in a controversy.

You have it from his own deliverance.

Shak., All's Well, ii. 5.

To be of any use in the controversy, then, the immediate deliverance of my consciousness must be competent to assure me of the non-existence of something which by hypothesis is not in my consciousness.

W. K. Clifford, Lectures, II. 162.

Indeed, so innocent and persistent have been the deliverances of their lordships upon the subject, that it might almost seem as though a bishop would have considered himself lacking in duty if he had omitted any opportunity of sounding the note of alarm.

Brit. Quarterly Rev., LXXXIII. 33.

7. In Scots law, the expressed decision of a judge or an arbitrator, interim or final. When interim, it is technically called an interlocutor.

deliverer (dē-liv'ér-er), n. [ME. deliverer; deliver + -er.] 1. One who delivers, rescues, or sets free; a savior or preserver.

The Lord raised up a deliverer to the children of Israel.

Judges iii. 9.

2. One who delivers by transferring or handing over: as, a deliverer of parcels or letters.—3. One who declares or communicates.

Truly, speaking of the law of nature, saith, that thereof God himself was inventor, . . . deliv-er, deliv-er.

Beacon, Beacon, Polity, viii. § 460.

deliveress (dē-liv'ér-ess), n. [ME. deliver + -ess.] A female deliverer. [Rare.]

Joan d'Arc, . . . the deliveress of the towns from our country men when they besieged it.

Shelley, Memoria, April 21, 1844.

deliverly (dē-liv'ér-ly), adv. [ME. deliverly, -liche; < deliver + -ly.] Nimble; cleverly; jauntily; actively. [Obsolete or archaic.]

When Gaheris laugh his brother Gawain, he lepte vpon his feet, and sette on his heed his battle deliverly, and hente a-gain his sword, and apparellede hym to defende.

Morte (K. T. S.), ii. 198.

Where be your ribbands, maids? swim with your bodies, And carry it sweetly and deliverly.

Fletcher (and another), Two Noble Kinsmen, iii. 4.

Every time we say a thing in conversation, we get a mechanical advantage in detaching it well and deliverly.

Emerson, Clubs.

deliverness (dē-liv'ér-ness), n. [ME. deliver-ness, -ness; < deliver + -ness.] Agility; nimbleness; speed. Chaucer.

This, for his deliverness and swiftness, was surnamed Horofote.

Felton, Chron., i. cxxvii.

delivery (dē-liv'ér-ē), n.; pl. deliveries (-is). [ME. deliver<sup>1</sup> + -y, after levery.] 1. The act of setting free; the act of freeing from bondage, danger, or evil of any kind; release; rescue; deliverance.

He . . . swore, with sobe, That he would labour my delivery.

Shak., Rich. III., i. 4.

In the delivery of them that surmise, no mans particular carefulness assued one person, but the meere goodnesse of God himselfe.

Quoted in Capt. John Smith's True Travels, II. 70.

2. A giving or passing from one to another; the act of transferring or handing over to another: as, the delivery of goods or of a deed; the delivery of a parcel or a letter.—3. Surrender; a giving up.

The delivery of your royal father's person into the hands of the army.

Sir J. Denham.

4. In law, the placing of one person in legal possession of a thing by another.—5. Aid given in the act of parturition; the bringing forth of offspring; childbirth.—6. Utterance; enunciation; manner of speaking or singing.

I was charmed with the gracefulness of his figure and delivery.

Addison.

Capacity for pouring out or disburdening of contents: as, the delivery of a pipe.—9. Free motion or use of the limbs; activity; agility.

The duke had the neater limbs, and freer delivery.

Sir H. Wotton.

10. In foundry, allowance or free play given to a pattern so that it can be readily lifted from the mold. Also called draw-taper.—Actual delivery, or delivery in fact, in law, a transfer of physical possession.—Constructive delivery, in law, such a change in the situation as in legal imports a transfer of possession.—Delivery of jurisdiction, in law, a term used in parts of the United States acquired from Mexico to denote the formal transfer of the possession of land required by Mexican law, which was necessary to the complete investiture of title; corresponding to the common-law livery of seisin. Under Mexican administration it was performed by a magistrate of the vicinage, and it included the establishment of boundaries when they were uncertain. The purchaser, in the presence of the magistrate and witnesses, pulled up grass and stones and threw them to the four winds of heaven, in token of his legal and legitimate possession. The magistrate made a record of these proceedings, duly attested by the witnesses, and gave a copy to the new owner.—Delivery-valve, in mech., the last of a series of rollers, or that which finally carries the object from the operative parts of the machine.—Delivery-valve, the valve through which a pumped fluid is discharged.—General delivery, the delivery of mail from the delivery-window of a post-office upon application of the persons to whom it is addressed.—Good delivery, in the law of sales, and particularly in the stock exchange, a delivery or tender by the seller prior to fulfil his obligation.—Jail delivery. See jail-delivery.—Symbolical delivery, in law, the delivery of property by handing over something else as a symbol, token, or representative of it, as, for instance, the key of the warehouse containing it.—W. & A. Brewster, Delivery. See election.

del (dē), n. [ME. del = MD. delle, D. del, a dale, vale, = G. dial, delle, a hollow; a deriv. (as dim.) of ME. dal, dale, E. dale: see dale.] For the relation of forms, cf. del, tale.] A small valley between hills; a little dale; a glen; a ravine.

That break (in the forest) is a del; a deep, hollow cup. Head with tail.

Charles Smith, Shirley, xii.

In a little del among the trees there is a small ruined mosque.

E. Taylor, Lands of the Saracen, p. 24.

delia (dē), n. [Origin obscure.] A young girl; a wench. [Thieves' cant.]

My del and my dainty wild del.

Midleton and Dalton, Boaring Girl, v. 1.

Della Crusca (dē-lā' krus'ka), [It. della, of the (< L. de, of, + illa, that); crusca, bran.] The name of an academy founded at Florence in 1583, mainly for promoting the purity of the Italian language. Its emblem was a stove, and its name referred to its purpose of sitting out the bran or refuse from the language. After a short period of incorporation in the Florentine Academy, it was revived in the early part of the nineteenth century.

Della-Cruscan (dē-lā' krus'kan), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to, characteristic of, or resembling the Academy della Crusca or its methods. The epithet Della-Cruscan was applied to a school of English poetry started by certain Englishmen at Florence toward the end of the eighteenth century, whose sentimentalities and affectations found many imitators in England. Against it the satire of Gifford's "Baviad" (1794) was directed.

The pent-up imagination, which here and there had trickled off in Della-Cruscan dilettantism.

Quarterly Rev., CLXIII. 68.

II. n. A member of the Academy della Crusca, or of the English school of poetry named after it.

Della Robbia ware. See ware.

delocalize (dē-lō'kal-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. delocalized, pp. delocalizing. [de-priv. + local-iz.] To free from the limitations of locality; widen the scope or interests of.

We can have no St. Simons or Poyennes till we have a Paris or London to delocalize our gossip and give it historical breadth.

Lowell, Study Windows, p. 82.

The principle of representation was constantly delocalizing the town, and bringing into the arena subjects which reminded men of their relationship to the state and the crown.

H. E. Souder, Noah Webster, p. 20.

deloo (dē-lō'), n. [N. African.] A kind of North African duikerbok, Cephalophorus griseus, one of the pygmy antelopes. It is about 3 feet long, of a fawn color with whitish flanks, black ankles, and a black stripe on the face running up to the tuft of hair on the poll.

delout, n. See delut. Lagard.

Delouyala (dē-lō-yā-lā), n. [NL., < Gr. dēlos, clear, + yalos, glass.] A genus of tortoise-beetles; a synonym of Coptocycla.

The name was used by Chevrolat in Dejean's catalogue without diagnosis.

An American species, Delouyala or Coptocycla clausa, is 7.6 millimeters long, very broadly oval, pale, testaceous, and has the elytra brown, tuberculate, and gibbous, with a large hyaline spot in the middle of the side margin and a similar small subapical spot, whence the name. It feeds on potato-vines.

delph, n. An improper spelling of delphi.

Delphacidae (dē-fas'ī-dā), n. pl. [NL., < Delphax (-ac-) + -idae.] A group of hemipterous insects, typified by the genus Delphax, regarded as one of the numerous subfamilies of Fulgoroidea, or referred to the Cixiidae.

Delphax (dē'faks), n. [NL., < Gr. dēlphax, a young pig.] A genus of phytophagous hemipterous insects, or plant-lice. D. saccharivora is a West Indian species very injurious to the sugar-cane.

Delphian (dē'lā-an), a. and n. [Delphi + -an.] I. a. 1. Relating to Delphi, a town of ancient Greece, on Mount Parnassus in Phocis, or to the sanctuary of Apollo at that place, the most celebrated fane of Greek worship.

The Delphian vales, the Delphian, the Delphian of the mind.

Hallock.

2. Of or pertaining to Apollo (as Apollo Delphinus, of Delphi), or to his priestesses (the Pythones) of the oracle of Delphi, who under inspiration delivered the responses of the oracle; hence, inspired.

An inward Delphian look.

Lowell, Among my Books, 3d ser., p. 222.

Also Delphianism.

II. n. 1. An inhabitant of Delphi.

The Delphian contributed a fourth, and collected everywhere for it. C. O. Muller, Manual of Archæol. (trans.), § 90.

2. With the definite article, Apollo.

Delphic (dē'fik), a. [L. Delphicus, < Gr. Δελφικός, pertaining to Δελφοί, Delphi.] Same as Delphian.

For still with Delphic emphasis she spann'd The quick invisible strings.

Keats.

delphin (dē'fin), n. [ME. delphin, delphin, < L. delphinus, ML. also delphinus, < Gr. δελφίν, later also δελφίς, a dolphin (Delphinus delphis). Hence delphin and delphinus, q. v.] A dolphin.

Thar both oft yake delphins, & so-calles, & balenes (grēt fisch, as hit were of whales kin).

Frederic, tr. of Higden's Polychronicon, i. 41.

delphin (dē'fin), a. [L. delphinus, also delphinus, a dolphin (in ML. applied to the eldest son of the king of France: see dolphin): see dolphin, n., and delphin.] 1. In soöl., pertaining to a dolphin, or to the Delphinida.—2. Pertaining or relating to the Dauphin of France.

Clabbed Tortoise-beetle (Delouyala clausa) (Line drawn natural size.)

Also dolphine, delphinian.

Delphin editions of the classics, a set of Latin classics prepared by thirty-nine scholars under the superintendence of Montanier, Boissier, and Huet, for the use of the dauphin (ad. v. 1684), son of Louis XIV. They are not now valued except for their indexes of words.

delphin (del'fin), n. [For delphinus (which is in use in another chem. sense), < Delphinus + -ine.] A neutral fat found in the oil of several members of the genus Delphinus.

Delphinapterinae (del-fī-nap'te-rī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Delphinapterus + -ina.] A subfamily of Delphinidae, containing the beluga or white whale (Delphinapterus) and the narwhal (Monodon), as together contrasted with other delphinoids collectively. They have the cervical vertebrae all distinct, and not more than 6 phalanges in any digit.

Delphinapterus (del-fī-nap'te-rus), n. [NL., < Gr. delphs, delphs, dolphin, + apteros, wingless (taken as 'finless,' with ref. to the absence of a dorsal fin), < priv. + pteron, a wing, a fin: see apterous.] 1. A genus of delphinoid odontocete cetaceans, typical of the subfamily Del-

Beluga, or White Whale (Delphinapterus leucas).

phinae, containing the beluga or white whale (D. leucas). It is related to Monodon, and resembles the narwhal except in dentition. It has 32 to 40 teeth; 50 vertebrae, the cervical vertebrae being 11 ribs; short, broad, and rounded fins; a low ridge in place of a dorsal fin; the head rounded; and the mouth very slightly projecting, if at all. The species attains a length of 15 feet, is white, and chiefly inhabits arctic seas. Beluga is a synonym.

2. A genus of dolphins (Delphinidae) which have no dorsal fin, as D. peroni: now called Leucorhamphus. See Delphinus, 1.

delphinic (del'fī-nīk), n. [ < delphin + -ic.] A salt formed by the union of delphinic acid with a base.

delphine, a. See delphin.

Delphinia (del-fī-nī-ā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl., < Gr. delphina (an epithet of Apollo), taken as 'of Delphi' (< delphi, Delphi), but in form < delphs, delphs, a dolphin: see dolphin, Delphia.] A festival of Apollo Delphinus (the Dolphin or protector of navigation, the god of Delphi), of expiatory character, celebrated at Athens and Argos, and generally among Ionian colonies along the Mediterranean coasts. At Athens it was held on the 6th of Mounychion (end of March), toward the close of the period of winter storms at sea, and included a procession in which seven boys and seven maidens bore olive-branches, bound with fillets of white wool, to the Delphinian temple near the temple of the Olympian Zeus.

delphinia (del-fī-nī-ā), n. Same as delphinidae.

Delphinian (del-fī-nī-an), a. 1. Same as Delphinian. Compare Pythian.—2. [i. e.] Same as delphin.

delphinian (del-fī-nī-an), a. 1. Same as Delphinian. Compare Pythian.—2. [i. e.] Same as delphin.

delphinic (del-fī-nīk), a. [ < L. delphinus, dolphin: see dolphin.] Noting an acid discovered by Chevreul first in dolphin-oil and afterward in the ripe berries of the Guelder-rose. It is now known to be identical with valeric acid.

Delphinidae (del-fī-nī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Delphinus + -idae.] A large family of odontocete cetaceans. By recent authors it has been limited to those having normally numerous teeth in both jaws; a short symphysis of the mandible, not exceeding one third the length of the jaw; no distinct lacrymal bones; the pterygoids short, scroll-like, and inviolated; the capitular articulations of the ribs disappearing backward; the costal cartilages ossified; and the blow-hole median, transversely crescentic, and concave forward. In size and shape the Delphinidae vary greatly. With few exceptions they are marine. As above described, the family includes all the marine cetaceans known as dolphins, porpoises, grampuses, etc., as well as the caaling, or pilot-whales, belugas or white whales, and the narwhal. It has been divided into Pontopornina, Delphinapterina, Delphinina, and Globicephalina.

Delphinina (del-fī-nī-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Delphinus + -ina.] The typical subfamily of Delphinidae, containing the dolphins and porpoises proper, together with the killers, as distinguished from the belugas, narwhals, black-fish, etc. They have no cervical constriction, the post-axial cervical vertebrae are more or less consolidated, and the second and third digits have from 5 to 9 phalanges. See cuts under dolphin and porpoise.

delphinine (del'fī-nīn), a. and n. 1. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Delphininae.

II. n. A species of Delphinina.

delphinine (del'fī-nīn), n. [ < delphin + -ine.] A highly poisonous vegetable alkaloid discovered in the plant Delphinium Staphenagria. Its taste is bitter and acrid. When heated it melts, but on cooling it becomes hard and brittle like resin. Applied externally, its effects are analogous to those of veratrine, and it has been used as a substitute for it in the treatment of neuralgia. Also delphinia, delphia, delphinia, delphia.

Delphinium (del-fī-nī-um), n. [NL., < Gr. delphion, larkspur (so called from the form of the neotary, which resembles the ordinary representations of the dolphin), < delphs, delphs, a dolphin: see dolphin.] An extensive genus of the natural order Ranunculaceae, consisting of annual or perennial herbaceous plants, with usually blue, purple, or white flowers. The flowers are in loose racemes, and are very irregular, consisting of five colored sepals and only two conspicuous petals, the spurs of which are enclosed in the long spur of the upper sepal. There are 50 species or more, scattered over the northern temperate zone, 30 of which are found in the United States. Two species peculiar to California have red or yellowish flowers. Many are cultivated in gardens under the name of larkspur, chiefly D. ajacis and D. consolida of Europe, and D. elatum from Siberia, with numerous hybrids. One species, the D. Staphenagria, commonly called stavesacre, yields the vegetable alkaloid delphinine.

delphinoid (del'fī-nōid), a. and n. [ < Gr. delphinoideus, like a dolphin, < delphs, delphs, a dolphin, + eidos, form.] 1. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Delphinidae or Delphinoidae; like or likened to a dolphin.

II. n. One of the Delphinidae or Delphinoidae; a dolphin, porpoise, or any other living toothed cetacean not a caelohote.

Delphinoidae (del-fī-nōid-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Delphinus + -oidae. See Delphinidae.] A superfamily group of odontocete cetaceans, containing all the living toothed whales, porpoises, dolphins, etc., excepting the sperm-whales or caelohotes. The families are the Iniidae, Platanistidae, Delphinidae, and Siphiidae. The association is made entirely on cranial characters.

delphinoidine (del-fī-nōid-in), n. [ < Delphinus + -oid + -ine.] An amorphous alkaloid obtained from the seeds of Delphinium Staphenagria.

Delphinula (del-fī-nū-lā), n. [NL., dim. of L. delphinus, a dolphin; so called on account of an imagined likeness to the conventional dolphin.] A genus of gastropods, typical of the family Delphinulidae.

Delphinulidae (del-fī-nū-lī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Delphinula + -idae.] A family of rhizidoglossate gastropods, typified by the genus Delphinula.

delphinula. They are destitute of cephalic lobes, but have cariniform appendages to the foot, and otherwise the animals resemble those of the families Turbinidae and Trochidae. The shell is turritate or discoidal and has a circular aperture. The operculum is multispiral and corneous, but sometimes provided with a thin calcareous layer. The living species are inhabitants of tropical seas. Numerous extinct forms have been referred to the family.

delphinuloid (del-fī-nū-lōid), a. [ < Delphinula + -oid.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Delphinulidae; like a member of the genus Delphinula.

Delphinus (del-fī-nus), n. [L., a dolphin: see dolphin and Delphinia.] 1. The typical genus of the family Delphinidae, to which very different limits have been assigned. (a) By the authors of the Linnean school it was used for all the cetaceans with teeth in both jaws, and consequently for the Delphinidae (except Monodon), Platanistidae, and Iniidae. (b) By later authors it was restricted to Delphinidae, but included at first all except those of the genera Phocaena and Delphinapterus; gradually others were excluded. (c) By recent authors it is restricted to species of Delphinidae whose chief peculiarity is in the deep longitudinal grooves on the sides of the palate, separating the alveolar border from the median ridge. They have numerous (more than 80) small pointed teeth, close set along each jaw; from 50 to 90 vertebrae; the rostral part of the skull longer than the cranial portion, whence the head has a pointed snout marked off from the forehead by a groove; the dorsal fin large, triangular or falcate, sometimes wanting; and the flippers of moderate size, narrow, pointed, and falcate, with the lateral digits small or rudimentary. As thus defined, the genus contains the animals to which the word dolphin should be restricted, as the original dolphin of the ancients, Delphinus delphis, but which are commonly called porpoises by confounding them with the species of Phocaena, sometimes called beaked or bay porpoises. The harpor, D. harpor, is a larger and bulkier species. A dry dolphin marked with white, attaining from 20 to 30 vertebrae, constitutes a group to which the name Lagenorhynchus is applied. A Chinese species, with only about 30 vertebrae, is called Steno cinctus. A species from the south seas, D. peroni, without a dorsal fin, has been called Leucorhamphus and Delphinapterus. See cut under dolphin.

2. One of the ancient constellations, representing a dolphin. It is situated east of Aquila.

delphinine (del'fī-nīn), n. An alkaloid obtained from the seeds of Delphinium Staphenagria. It appears in crystalline tufts.

delta (del'tā), n. [ = D. G. Dan. Sw. F. Sp. Pg. It., etc., delta, < L. delta, < Gr. deltā, the name of the 4th letter, also anything so shaped, esp. a triangular island formed by the mouths of large rivers, as of the Nile, Indus, etc.; < Heb. daleth, the 4th letter of the alphabet, lit. a door: see D.] 1. The name of the Greek letter Δ, answering to the Latin and English D. See D.—2. A triangular island or alluvial tract included between the diverging branches of the mouth of a great river: as, the delta of the Nile, of the Ganges, of the Mississippi, etc.—3. In anat., a triangular space or surface.—Delta fornicis, in anat., the delta of the fornicis; the triangular entocuticular area of the inferoposterior surface of the fornicis, constituting the roof of the aulla. In the cat its base coincides with a line between the pores, and its two other sides are ripe, or the lines of reflection of the endyma upon the intruded sulci. Wilder and Gage, Anat. Tech., p. 477.—Delta mesencephali, in anat., the delta of the mesencephali; the triangular area at the root of the spine of the scapula, at the vertebral end of the mesencephali. Wilder and Gage, Anat. Tech., p. 155.

deltale (del-tā'le), a. [ < delta + -ale.] 1. Pertaining to or like a delta.

The delta is formed by the three most westerly of the main spill-streams of the Ganges.

Nineteenth Century, XXIII. 43.

2. Having or forming a delta.

It [Bharatpur] now discloses the last stage in the decay of a delta river.

Nineteenth Century, XXIII. 43.

delta-metal (del'tā-met'pl), n. [ < delta, a triangular figure (in allusion to the three constituent metals), + metal.] An alloy of copper and zinc with a small percentage of iron, recently introduced and put to use in England and Germany. It resembles Aich metal and stero-metal (see these words), the principal difference being that in the manufacture of delta-metal improvements have been made by means of which a fixed percentage of iron can be introduced, which was not the case with the other alloys mentioned, whence these never came into general use.

Delta-metal is said to be as strong as mild steel, and to have the great advantage of not rusting. A small steamer has been constructed of this alloy for navigating the rivers of Central Africa. It is said, also, that it has been introduced as a material for rolls in powder-mills because not liable to give rise to sparks as steel rollers do, and that it is coming into use for many other purposes where strength is desired, and where the facility with which steel rusts makes its employment undesirable.

deltidium (del-tīd-i-um), n.; pl. deltidia (-j). [NL., dim. of Gr. deltā, the letter Δ: see delta.] In soöl., the triangular space between the beak and the hinge of brachiopod shells. It is usually covered in by a shelly plate.

deltoidedron (del-tōid-hē-dron), n.; pl. deltoidedra (-drā). [ < Gr. deltā, delta, + edra, a seat, base.] In crystal., a hemihedral isometric solid bounded by twelve faces, each a quadrilateral. The corresponding holohedral form is a trigonal triscotahedron.

deltoid (del'tōid), a. and n. [ = F. deltoides = Sp. deltoides = Pg. It. deltoides, < NL. deltoides, < Gr. deltōideus, delta-shaped, < deltā, delta (Δ), + eidos, form.] 1. a. Resembling the Greek letter Δ; triangular.

A visit to the shore showed its mouth to be deltoid in character, three mouths being noticed, and probably more existing.

Specifically—(a) In anat.: (1) Forming a triangular plate or part; being triangular: as, the deltoid muscle. (2) Relating to the deltoid muscle: as, the deltoid crest of the humerus. (b) In entom., pertaining to or resembling the pyramidal moth, or Deltoides. (c) In bot., triangular or broad-shaped: as, a deltoid leaf; also applied to the cross-section of a leaf, etc.—Deltoid moth, a popular name given to various species of the pyralid genus Pyralis, which lay their eggs in the form of a triangle.

2. One of the ancient constellations, representing a dolphin. It is situated east of Aquila.

delphinine (del'fī-nīn), n. An alkaloid obtained from the seeds of Delphinium Staphenagria. It appears in crystalline tufts.

delta (del'tā), n. [ = D. G. Dan. Sw. F. Sp. Pg. It., etc., delta, < L. delta, < Gr. deltā, the name of the 4th letter, also anything so shaped, esp. a triangular island formed by the mouths of large rivers, as of the Nile, Indus, etc.; < Heb. daleth, the 4th letter of the alphabet, lit. a door: see D.] 1. The name of the Greek letter Δ, answering to the Latin and English D. See D.—2. A triangular island or alluvial tract included between the diverging branches of the mouth of a great river: as, the delta of the Nile, of the Ganges, of the Mississippi, etc.—3. In anat., a triangular space or surface.—Delta fornicis, in anat., the delta of the fornicis; the triangular entocuticular area of the inferoposterior surface of the fornicis, constituting the roof of the aulla. In the cat its base coincides with a line between the pores, and its two other sides are ripe, or the lines of reflection of the endyma upon the intruded sulci. Wilder and Gage, Anat. Tech., p. 477.—Delta mesencephali, in anat., the delta of the mesencephali; the triangular area at the root of the spine of the scapula, at the vertebral end of the mesencephali. Wilder and Gage, Anat. Tech., p. 155.

deltale (del-tā'le), a. [ < delta + -ale.] 1. Pertaining to or like a delta.

The delta is formed by the three most westerly of the main spill-streams of the Ganges.

Nineteenth Century, XXIII. 43.

2. Having or forming a delta.

It [Bharatpur] now discloses the last stage in the decay of a delta river.

II. n. The large, coarse-fibered, triangular muscle of the shoulder, covering and protecting the joint, arising from the spine of the scapula, the acromion and the clavicle, and inserted into the deltoid crest of the humerus. Its action raises the arm away from the side of the body. See cut under muscle.

deltoidal (del-toi'dal), a. [< deltoid + -al.] Triangular; deltoid.

From ancient times down to the twelfth century, square, rectangular, or deltoidal instruments of the harp kind appear to have been very common.

W. K. Sullivan, Int. to O'Curry's Anc. Irish, p. dv.

deltoid, n. Plural of deltoides.

deltoides (del-toi'dēs), n. [NL.: see deltoid.] 1. In anat., the deltoid muscle. See deltoid, n.

The deltoides proceeds from the clavicle and scapula to the humerus. Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 42.

2. [cap.] [Used as a plural.] In entom., a division of nocturnal Lepidoptera; the deltoid Lepidoptera of early entomologists, inexactly corresponding with the pyralid moths or family Pyralidae of later systems.

deltoides (del-toi'dēs), n.; pl. deltoides (-ī). [NL.: see deltoid.] The deltoid muscle. See deltoid, n.

delubrum (dē-lū'brum), n.; pl. delubra (-brā). [L., a temple, shrine, sanctuary, prob. so called as the place of expiation; the lit. sense is more obvious in ML. delubrum, a baptismal font; < L. deluere, wash off, cleanse, < de, away, + luere, wash.] 1. In Rom. anth., a temple or sanctuary, by some scholars believed to have contained a basin or fountain in which persons coming to sacrifice washed. But the actual distinction between delubrum and templum is uncertain.—2. In eccl., a church, a church furnished with a font.—3. A font or baptismal basin.

deludable (dē-lū'dā-bl), a. [< delude + -able.] Susceptible of being deluded or deceived; liable to be imposed upon or misled.

For well understanding the omniscience of his nature, he is not so ready to deceive himself as to falsify unto him whose cognition is in no way deludable.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., t. 2.

delude (dē-lūd'), v. t.; pret. and pp. deluded, ppr. deluding. [< ME. deluden, < OF. deluder, also deluer, < L. deludere, pp. delusus, mock, make sport of, deceive, < de + ludere, play, jest. Cf. allude, collude, illude.] 1. To deceive; impose upon; mislead the mind or judgment of; beguile; cheat.

Shouldst thou deluded feed

On hopes so groundless, thou art mad indeed
Crabbe, Works, IV, 102.

Peterborough wrote two letters to the governor, one of which he contrived to have intercepted by the Spanish general, with the result of deluding him into the belief that he was surrounded by a large army.

Quarterly Rev., CXLV, 126.

2t. To frustrate or disappoint; elude; evade.

They which during life and health are never destitute of ways to delude repentance, do notwithstanding oftentimes, when their last hour draweth on, . . . feel that stinging which before lay dead in them.

Hooker, Eccl., Polity, vi. 4.

Whate'er his arts be, wife, I will have thee
Delude them with a trick, thy obstinate silence.

B. Jonson, Devil is an Ass, i. 2.

—Syn. 1. Mislead, Delude (see mislead); to cozen, dupe, lead astray.

deluder (dē-lū'dēr), n. One who deceives or beguiles; an impostor; one who holds out false pretenses.

And thus the sweet deluders tune their song. Pope.

deluge (del'j), n. [< ME. deluge, < OF. deluge, deluere, F. déluge = Fr. diluvi = Sp. Pg. It. diluvio, < L. diluvium, a flood, < diluere, wash away, < de, dis-, away, + luere, wash. Cf. diluvial.] 1. Any overflowing of water; an inundation; a flood; specifically, the great flood or overflowing of the earth (called the universal deluge) which, according to the account in Genesis, occurred in the days of Noah, or any of the similar floods found in the traditions of most ancient peoples, accompanied by a nearly total destruction of life. See flood.

The apostle doth plainly intimate that the old world was subject to perih by a deluge, as this is subject to perih by conflagration. T. Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

2. Anything analogous to an inundation; anything that overwhelms or floods.

A fiery deluge fed

With ever-burning sulphur unconsumed.
Milton, P. L., l. 62.

Saw Babylon set wide her two-leav'd brass

To let the military deluge pass.
Comper, Expectation.

After see the deluge (F. après moi le déluge), a saying ascribed to Louis XV., who expressed thus his indifference to the results of his policy of selfish and reckless extravagance, and perhaps his apprehension of coming disaster.

deluge (del'j), v.; pret. and pp. deluged, ppr. deluging. [< deluge, n.] 1. Trans. 1. To pour over in a deluge; overwhelm with a flood; overflow; inundate; drown.

Still the battering waves rush in,
Implacable, till, delug'd by the foam,
The ship sinks, foundering in the vast abyss.

Philips.

Lands deluged by unbridled floods.

Wordsworth, The Brownie's Cell.

2. To overrun like a flood; pour over in overwhelming numbers: as, the northern nations deluged the Roman empire with their armies.

—3. To overwhelm; cause to sink under the weight of a general or spreading calamity.

At length corruption, like a general flood,
Shall deluge all. Pope, Moral Essays, iii. 137.

II. *trans. To suffer a deluge; be deluged. [Rare.]

I'd weep the world to such a strain,
That it should deluge once again.

Marquis of Montrose, Death of Charles I.

delul (de-lū'), n. [Ar.] A female dromedary. Also written deloul.

Begunins bestriding naked-backed Deluls, and clinging like apes to the hairy humps.

R. F. Burton, El-Medina, p. 226.

de lunatio inquirendo (dē-lū-nat'i-kō in-kwi-ren'dō). [L., of investigating a lunatic: de, of; lunatio, abl. of lunaticus, a lunatic (see lunatic); inquirendo, abl. ger. of inquirere, inquire, question, investigate (see inquire).] The old title of the writ or commission (now commonly called an inquisition) issued formerly out of Chancery and now by various courts, appointing commissioners to investigate, with the aid of a jury, the mental condition of a person alleged to be of unsound mind, in order that, if found incapable of managing his own affairs, a committee may be appointed to take charge of them, and his dealing with others who might impose upon him be interdicted.

delusion (dē-lū'shun), n. [= OF. delusion = Sp. delusión = Pg. delusão = It. delusione, < L. delusio (-n-), < deludere, delude: see delude.] 1. The act of deluding; a misleading of the mind; deception.

For God hath justly given the nations up To thy delusions. Milton, P. R., l. 442.

The major's good judgment—that is, if a man may be said to have good judgment who is under the influence of love's delusion.

Thackeray, Vanity Fair.

2. The state of being deluded; false impression or belief; error or mistake, especially of a fixed nature: as, his delusion was unconquerable. See the synonyms below.

God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie. 2 Thea. ii. 11.

Some angry power cheats with rare delusions
My credulous sense.

Ford, Lover's Melancholy, iv. 3.

I, waking, view'd with grief the rising sun,
And fondly morn'd the dear delusion gone. Prior.

Of all the delusions against which history and historical geography have to strive, there is none more deeply rooted than the notion that there has always been a land called Switzerland and a people called the Swiss.

E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lect., p. 222.

—Syn. 2. Illusion, Delusion, Hallucination. As now technically used, especially by the best authorities in medical jurisprudence, delusion signifies a false mental appearance or conception produced by an external cause acting through the senses, the falsity of which is capable of detection by the subject of it by examination or reasoning. Thus, a mirage, or the momentary belief that a reflection in a mirror is a real object, is an illusion. A delusion is a fixed false mental conception, occasioned by an external object acting upon the senses, but not capable of correction or removal by examination or reasoning. Thus, a fixed belief that an inanimate object is a living person, that all one's friends are conspiring against one, that all food offered is poisoned, and the like, are delusions. A hallucination is a false conception occasioned by internal conditions without external cause or aid of the senses, such as imagining that one hears an external voice when there is no sound to suggest such an idea. If a person walking at twilight, seeing a post, should believe it to be a spy pursuing him, and should imagine he saw it move, this would be an illusion, a continuous belief that every person one sees is a spy pursuing one, if such as cannot be removed by evidence, is a delusion, a belief that one sees such spies pursuing, when there is no object in sight capable of suggesting such a thought, is a hallucination. Illusions are not necessarily indications of insanity, delusions and hallucinations, if fixed, are. In literary and popular use an illusion is an unreal appearance presented in any way to the bodily or the mental vision; it is often pleasing, harmless, or even useful. The word delusion expresses strongly the mental condition of the person who puts too great faith in an illusion or any other error he "labors under a delusion." A delusion is a mental error or deception, and may have regard to things actually existing, as well as to illusions. Delusions are ordinarily repulsive and discreditable, and may even be mischievous. We speak of the illusions of fancy, hope, youth, and the like, but of the delusions of a fanatic or a lunatic. A hallucination is the product of an imagination disordered, perhaps beyond the bounds of sanity; a slightly or crazy notion or belief, generally of some degree of permanence; a special aberration of belief as to some specific point; the central suggestion in the word is that of the groundlessness of the belief or opinion.

Poetry produces an illusion on the eye of the mind, as a magic lantern produces an illusion on the eye of the body. Macaulay, Milton.

Dreams or illusions, call them what you will,
They lift us from the commonplace of life
To better things. Longfellow, Michael Angelo.

The people never give up their liberties but under some delusion. Burke, Speech at County Meeting in Bucks, 1794.

Those other words of delusion and folly, Liberty first and Union afterward. D. Webster, Reply to Hayne.

Mankind would be subject to fewer delusions than they are, if they constantly bore in mind their liability to false judgments due to unusual combinations, either artificial or natural, of true sensations.

Huxley and Youmans, Physiol., § 222.

A few hallucinations about a subject to which the greatest clerks have been generally such strangers may warrant us to dissent from his opinion. Boyle.

delusional (dē-lū'shun-al), a. [< delusion + -al.] 1. Pertaining to, characterized by, or of the nature of delusion.

The hitherto recognized delusional insanities.

Allen and Neurol., VIII, 644.

2. Afflicted with delusions: as, the delusional insane.

In a third case a systematized delusional lunatic had delusions of persecution. Allen and Neurol., IV, 422.

delusionist (dē-lū'shun-ist), n. [< delusion + -ist.] One who causes or is a subject of delusion; a deluding or deluded person.

The principles of evidence that have heretofore commanded the world's acceptance make no distinction in the quality or quantity of testimony for different varieties of claims. . . . Under this feature of current logic delusionists of all kinds have consistently and persistently found refuge. Pop. Sci. Mo., XIII, 322.

delusive (dē-lū'siv), a. [= Sp. delusivo, < L. as if **delusivus*, < delusus, pp. of deludere, delude: see delude.] 1. Apt to delude; causing delusion; deceptive; beguiling: as, delusive arts; delusive appearances.

A fox

Stretched on the earth, with fine delusive sleights, Mocking a gaping crow. B. Jonson, Volpone, i. 1

That fond, delusive, happy, transient spell,
That hides us from a world wherein we dwell
Crabbe, Works, VII, 202.

2. Of the nature of a delusion; unreal; imaginary. [Rare.]

There is no such thing as a delusious, or delusive, sensation. A sensation must exist to be a sensation, and if it exists, it is real and not delusive.

Huxley and Youmans, Physiol., § 270.

—Syn. 1. See fallacious and deceptive.

delusively (dē-lū'siv-ly), adv. In a delusive manner; so as to delude.

delusiveness (dē-lū'siv-ness), n. The quality of being delusive; tendency to deceive.

When they have been driven out by opposite evidence, . . . then indeed we may discover their delusiveness.

A. Tusher, Light of Nature, i. l. 11.

delusory (dē-lū'sō-ri), a. [= OF. delusorie, F. delusoire = Sp. It. delusorio, < LL. as if **delusorius*, < delusor, a deceiver, < L. deludere, pp. of deludere, deceive, delude: see delude.] Apt to deceive; deceptive; delusive.

These delusory false pretences, which have neither truth nor substance in them. Prynne, Histrio-Mastix, II iv. 2.

delusivet, n. See diluvie.

delvauxene, delvauxite (del-vô'sên, -sî), n. [After the Belgian chemist Delvaux.] A variety of durifrenite containing a large excess of water. delve (delv), v.; pret. and pp. delled (pret. formerly dolve, pp. dolven), ppr. dolving. [ME. delven (pret. dalf, dolve, pp. dolven), < AS. delfan (pret. dealf, pl. dulfan), < OHG. bi-delfhan = OHG. bi-tellhan, bury.] 1. trans. 1. To dig; turn up or excavate with a spade or some other tool.

To delve up small the moulds of every route.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 77.

Delve of convenient depth your thrashing-floor.
Dryden.

2. To bury.

Salomon for this cause made it to be taken up and dolven depe in the grounds.
Holy Road (E. E. T. S.), p. 156.

II. *intrans. 1. To practise digging; labor with the spade.

The common people . . . doe dig and dolve with undetigable toyle.
Sandys, Travailes, p. 315.

When Adam dolv'd and Eve span,
Who was then a gentleman? Old rime.

Ever of her he thought when he delt in the soil of his garden.
Longfellow, Miles Standish, viii.

2. Figuratively, to carry on laborious or continued research or investigation, as one digging for hidden treasure.

Not in the cells where frigid learning delves
In Aldine folios mouldering on their shelves.
O. W. Holmes, Poetry.

He remained satisfied with himself to the last, dolving in his own mine.
Whipple, Sea and Rev., II. 26.

dolve (delv), v. [ME. dolve; the same word as delv, q. v.; from the verb.] 1. A place dug or hollowed out; a pitfall; a ditch; a den; a cave.

In dolve deepe is sette thair [almonds'] appetite,
Thaire magnitude a larger launde requireth.
Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 57.

It is a darksome dolve farre under ground.
Spenser, F. Q., IV. i. 20.

2. That which is dug out: as, a dolve of coals (a certain quantity of coal dug from a mine). [Prov. Eng.]

delver (del'vër), n. [ME. delvere, < AS. delfere, a digger, < delfan, dig; see delve.] 1. One who digs with or as if with a spade.

It is so good that in the blossomyng
She wol not lese a floure that forth is brought.
The delver is to help her with delvyng.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 37.

He turned and looked as keenly at her
As careful robins eye the delver's toll.
Tennyson, Geraint.

2. Figuratively, a patient and laborious investigator.

delving (del'ving), n. 1. Digging.—2. Figuratively, search; laborious investigation; research.

It was no ordinary delving which struck into the dispersed veins of the dim and dark mine of our history.
J. D. Ives, Ames, of Lit., I. 270.

demagnetisation (dê-mag'net-i-zâ'shûn), n. [demagnetise + -ation.] 1. The act or process of depriving of magnetic polarity.—2. In mesmerism, the act of restoring a person in the mesmeric trance to a normal state of consciousness; demesmerization.

Also spelled demagnetization.

demagnetize (dê-mag'net-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. demagnetised, ppr. demagnetising. [depriv. + magnetize.] 1. To deprive of magnetic polarity.

A thunder-storm demagnetised the compass of his Britannic majesty's ship Wren, in which I was then a midshipman.
W. C. Russell, Jack's Courtship, xxi.

The induction of a magnet on itself always tends to diminish the magnetisation, and acts like a demagnetising force.
Atkinson, tr. of Mascart and Joubert, I. 282.

2. To demesmerize; restore from a mesmerized state to normal consciousness.

Also spelled demagnetise.

demagogic, demagogical (dem-a-gôj'ik, -i-kal), a. [= F. demagogique = Sp. demagógico = Pg. demagogico (cf. D. G. demagogisch = Dan. Sw. demagogisk), < Gr. δημαγωγία, of or fit for a demagogue, < δημαγωγός, a demagogue; see demagogue.] Relating to or like a demagogue; given to pandering to the rabble from self-interest.

Demagogic leaders from South Germany stamped the province and stirred up the people.
Low, Hismark, I. 282.

demagogism, demagogism (dem-a-gôj-izm), n. [demagogue + -ism.] The practices and principles of a demagogue; a pandering to the multitude for selfish ends.

There has been nothing of Cleon, still less of Strepsades striving to underbid him in underbidding to be found in the public utterances of Mr. Lincoln.
Lowell, Study Windows, p. 172.

demagogue (dem-a-gog), n. [F. demagogue = Sp. Pg. It. demagogo = D. demagog = G. Dan. Sw. demagog = Russ. demagog, < NL. demagogus, < Gr. δημαγωγός, a leader of the people, < δημος, the people, the populace, + αγωγός, a leader, < αγω, lead; see agent, act.] 1. Historically, a leader of the people; a person who sways the people by oratory or persuasion.

Demosthenes and Cleon, though each of them a leader, or, as the Greeks called it, a demagogue, in a popular state, yet seem to differ in their practice.
Swift.

All the popular jealousies and alarms at regal authority would have been excited by demagogues in the senate as well as in the comitia; for there are in all nations aristocratical demagogues as well as democratical.
J. Adams, Works, IV. 524.

2. An unprincipled popular orator or leader; one who endeavors to curry favor with the people or some particular portion of them by pandering to their prejudices or wishes, or by playing on their ignorance or passions; specifically, an unprincipled political agitator; one who seeks to obtain political power or the furtherance of some sinister purpose by pandering to the ignorance or prejudice of the populace.

A plausible insignificant word, in the mouth of an expert demagogue, is a dangerous and deceitful weapon.
South, Works, II. ix.

To lessen the hopes of usurping demagogues, we must enlighten, animate, and combine the spirit of freemen.
Ames, Works, II. 273.

The doctrine of State rights can be so handled by an adroit demagogue as easily to confound the distinction between liberty and lawlessness in the minds of ignorant persons.
Lowell, Study Windows, p. 162.

demagoguery (dem-a-gôg-urî), n. [demagogue + -ery.] Action characteristic of a demagogue; demagogism.

An element of demagoguery tampered with the Irish vote in the person of Jerry, nominally porter.
The Century, XXXII. 224.

demagoguism, n. See demagogism.

demagog (dem-a-gôj), n. [= G. demagog = Dan. Sw. demagog, < F. demagoge = Sp. Pg. It. demagogia, < Gr. δημαγωγία, < δημαγωγός, a demagogue; see demagogue.] Demagogism.

American demagoguery . . . devotes more efforts to convincing . . . the public conscience than to enlightening the public mind upon the economic or sociological bearings of the [Chinese] question.
N. A. Rev., CXXVI. 502.

demailn (dê-mân'), n. [Early mod. E. also demailne, demailne, demailne, demailne (the last being the spelling now usual); < ME. demayn, demailne, demailne, demailne, demailne; < OF. demaine, demailne, demagne, demailne, power, dominion, a var. of domaine (whence the other E. form domain), < L. dominiûm, right of ownership, power, dominion; see domain and domine, doublets of demailn, and see dominion, damage.] 1. Power; dominion.

There finds I now that every creature
Sometime a yere hath love in his demailn.
Gower, Conf. Amant, III. 249.

That al the world weilded in his [Alexander's] demailne.
Chaucer, Monk's Tale, I. 675.

2. Same as domain.—3. Same as domene.

Come, take possession of this wealthy place.
The Earth's sole glory: take, (dear Son) to thee
This Farm's demailne, leave the Chief right to me.
Sylvestre, tr. of Da Barthe's Weeks, II. Eden.

You know
How narrow our demailns are, and, what's more,
... we hardly can subsist.
Masinger, The Picture, I. 1.

In his demailn (or demaine) as of fee, in old Eng. law, the technical expression for an estate of fee simple in possession.

In England there is no Land (that of the Crown only excepted) which is not held of a Superior; for all depend either mediately or immediately on the Crown: So that when a Man in Pleading would signify his Lands to be his own, he says, That he is or was seized or possessed thereof in his demailn as of Fee; whereby he means, that altho' his Land be to him and his Heirs for ever, yet it is not true Demailn, but depending upon a Superior Lord.
E. Phillips, 1702.

demand (dê-mând'), v. [Early mod. E. also demand; < *ME. *demenan* (not found, but the noun occurs), < OF. demander, F. demander = Pr. Sp. Pg. demandar = It. domandare, < ML. domandare, demand, L. give in charge, intrust, < de, away, + mandare, intrust, commit; see mandate, and cf. command, remand.] 1. trans. 1. To ask or require as by right or authority, or as that to which one has some valid claim; lay claim to; exact: as, parents demand obedience; what price do you demand?

No ought demand but that we loving be,
As he himselfe hath lov'd us afore-hand.
Spenser, Heavenly Love.

The pound of flesh, which I demand of him,
Is dearly bought; 'tis mine, and I will have it.
Shak., M. of V., iv. 1.

We demand of superior men that they be superior in this—that the mind and the virtue shall give their verdict in their day, and accelerate so far the progress of civilization.
Emerson, Fugitive Slave Law.

2. To ask or interrogate by authority or in a formal manner. [Now rare.]

The officers of the children of Israel . . . were beaten, and *demand*ed. Wherefore have ye not fulfilled your task in making brick?
Ex. v. 14.

Will you, I pray, demand that demi-devil,
Why he hath thus ensnar'd my soul and body?
Shak., Othello, v. 2.

He was *demand*ed, if he were of the same opinion he had been in about the petition or remonstrance.
Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 225.

And Guinevere . . . desired his name, and sent Her maiden to demand it of the dwarf.
Tennyson, Geraint.

3. To ask for with insistence or urgency; make a positive requisition for; exact as a tribute or a concession: as, the thief *demand*ed my purse.

And when all things were ready, the people with shouts *demand*ed the sacrifice, which usually was accustomed for the health of their Nation.
Peregrine, Pilgrimage, p. 262.

A proper jest, and never heard before,
That Suffolk should demand a whole fifteenth,
For costs and charges in transporting her!
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., I. 1.

4. To call for; require as necessary or useful: as, the execution of this work *demand*s great care.

All that fashion *demand*s is composure and self-content.
Emerson, Essays, 2d ser., p. 121.

Sacrifices are not accomplished simply because occasions demand them.
N. A. Rev., CXXXIX. 302.

5. In law, to summon to court: as, being *demand*ed, he does not come.—Syn. 1 and 2. Request, beg, etc. See ask.

II. *intrans. To make a demand; inquire peremptorily; ask.

The soldiers likewise *demand*ed of him, saying, And what shall we do?
Luke III. 14.

demand (dê-mând'), n. [ME. demando, demando, < OF. demande, F. demande = Pr. Sp. Pg. demanda = It. dimanda, a demand; from the verb.] 1. An asking for or a claim made by virtue of a right or supposed right to the thing sought; an authoritative claim; an exaction: as, the *demand*s of one's creditors.

He will give you audience: and wherein
It shall appear that your *demand*s are just.
You shall enjoy them.
Shak., 2 Hen. IV., iv. 1.

He that has the confidence to turn his wishes into *demand*s will be but a little way from thinking he ought to obtain them.
Locke.

2. An insistent asking or requisition; exaction without reference to right: as, the *demand*s of a blackmailer.—3. That which is demanded or required; something claimed, exacted, or necessary: as, what are your *demand*s upon the estate? the *demand*s upon one's time; the *demand*s of nature.

The sufferings of the poor are not caused by their having little as compared with the rich; but by their having little as compared with the simplest *demand*s of human nature.
W. H. Mallach, Social Equality, p. 202.

4. The state of being in request or sought after; requisition; call.

In 1678 came forth a second edition [of the "Pilgrim's Progress"] with additions; and then the demand became immense.
Massey, John Bunyan.

Specifically—5. In polit. econ., the desire to purchase and possess, coupled with the power of purchasing: sometimes technically called effective demand: as, the supply exceeds the demand; there is no demand for pig-iron.

Adam Smith, who introduced the expression effective demand, employed it to denote the demand of those who are willing and able to give for the commodity what he calls its natural price: that is, the price which will enable it to be permanently produced and brought to market.
J. S. Mill, Lib. Econ., III. II. § 2.

I would therefore define . . . Demand as the desire for commodities or services, seeking its end by an offer of general purchasing power.
Osborne, Pol. Econ., I. II. § 2.

6. In law: (a) The right to claim anything from another person, whether founded on contract or tort, or superior right of property. (b) The asking or seeking for what is due or claimed as due, either expressly by words, or by implication, as by seizure of goods or entry into lands.—7. Inquiry; question; interrogation.

Then they asked hym many *demand*s, but he wolde speke no more.
Morin (E. E. T. S.), I. 12.

The good Anchoret raised him with his hand,
Who, thus encouraged, answered our demand.
Dryden, Amiel, III.

Alternative demand. See alternative.—Demand and supply, in polit. econ., the relation between the desire to sell and that to buy, or between those things of exchangeable value which are for sale and those which can be purchased; used most commonly in the expression law of demand and supply, the law that as the demand for a given commodity increases, or while the demand remains the same the supply falls off, the price of that commodity rises; and as the demand falls off, or the supply increases without a corresponding increase of demand, the price falls.

Demand and supply govern the value of all things which cannot be indefinitely increased.

J. S. Mill, Pol. Econ., III. III. § 2.

Demand note, a note payable on demand—that is, on presentation; specifically, in the financial history of the United States, one of the notes which composed the issue of $60,000,000 of paper money authorized by a law enacted by Congress in July, 1861, for that purpose.—Effectual demand, in polit. econ. See d.—In demand, in request; much sought after or courted: as, these goods are in demand; his company is in great demand.—On demand, on being claimed; on presentation: as, a bill payable on demand; all checks are payable on demand.

demandaible (dē-mān'ā-bl), a. [< demand + -able.] That may be demanded, claimed, asked for, or required: as, payment is demandaible at the expiration of the credit.

demandant (dē-mān'dant), n. [< F. demandant (= Sp. Pg. It. demandante), ppr. of demandor, demand: see demand.] In law, one who demands; the plaintiff in a real action (so called because he demands something); any plaintiff.

demandeur (dē-mān'dēr), n. [< demand + -er.] Cf. F. demandeur = Pr. demandaire, demandador, demandor = It. demandatore. One who demands.

Yet, to so fair and courteous a demander,
That promises compassion, at worst pity,
I will relate a little of my story.

Beau. and Fl., Captain, II. 1.

demandress (dē-mān'dres), n. [< demandor + -ess.] In law, a female demandant.

demandoid (de-mān'toid), n. [< G. demant, diamant, diamond, + -oid.] A light-green to emerald-green variety of garnet, found in the Ural mountains. It is transparent and of brilliant luster, and is classed as a gem.

demarcate (dē-mār'kāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. demarcated, ppr. demarcating. [< NL. demarcatus, pp. of demarcare, mark off, set the bounds of: see demark.] 1. To mark off from adjoining land or territory; set the limits or boundaries of.

The thoughtful critics argue that it was a mistake for us to demarcate the frontier of Afghanistan, for by so doing we have defined and increased our responsibilities.

Nineteenth Century, XXII. 477.

2. To determine the relative limits of; separate or clearly discriminate.

Matter and motion, force and cause, have also their transcendental elements, and it is the province of metaphysics to demarcate these from the known and knowable elements. G. H. Lewis, Probs. of Life and Mind, I. 1. § 43.

demarcation (dē-mār-kā'shon), n. [< F. démarcation = Sp. demarcacion = Pg. demarcação = It. demarcatione, < NL. demarcatio(n-), < demarcare, set the bounds of: see demarcate, demark.] 1. The act of marking off limits or boundaries; determination by survey of the line of separation between adjoining lands or territories; delimitation: as, the demarcation of the frontiers.

The Russian ministers proposed that, before proceeding to actual demarcation, we should settle with them the general principles and cardinal points upon which the joint commission should work. Edinburgh Rev., CLXIII. 6.

2. In general, the act of determining the relative limits or extent of anything; separation; discrimination.

The speculative line of demarcation, where obedience ought to end and resistance must begin, is faint, obscure, and not easily definable. Burke, Rev. in France.

demarch (dē-mār'ch), n. [< F. démarcher, gait, walk, step, a step taken with the object of securing anything, < OF. démarcher, march, walk, advance, < de + marcher, march: see march.] March; excursion; manner of proceeding.

Imagination cultivates reason in its most extravagant demarches. London Journal, 1781.

demarchus (dē-mār'ch), n. [< L. demarchus, < Gr. δῆμαρχος, < δήμος, a district, deme, + ἀρχων, ruler.] 1. The ruler or magistrate of an ancient Attic deme.—2. The mayor of a modern Greek town.

See demarcation.

dematerialization (dē-mā-tē-ri-ā-l-ā-zā'shon), n. [< dematerialize + -ation.] 1. The act of dematerializing, or divesting of material qualities.

Mrs. Jemima's dowry . . . would suffice to prevent that gradual process of dematerialization which the lengthened diet upon minnows and sticklebacks had already made apparent in the fine and slow-evanishing form of the philosopher.

Bulwer, My Novel, III. 17.

2. In mod. spiritualism, the alleged act or process of dissolving and vanishing after materialization (which see).

Also spelled dematerialisation.
dematerialize (dē-mā-tē-ri-ā-l-ā-z), v.; pret. and pp. dematerialized, ppr. dematerializing. [= F. dematerialiser; as de-priv. + materialize.] I. trans. To divest of material qualities or characteristics.

Dematerializing matter by stripping it of everything which . . . has distinguished matter. Nümen.

II. intrans. In mod. spiritualism, to dissolve and disappear, as alleged, after materialization.

If he [the ghost] ever "materialized," he was careful to dematerialize again before any one could get a sample of his beautiful work. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVIII. 410.

Also spelled dematerialise.
Dematiæ, Dematiæ (dēm-ā-tī-ē-ē, -ī), n. pl. [NL. < Dematium + -æ, -æ.] The largest family of hyphomycetous fungi. The mycelium is usually abundant, fusiform or black, and somewhat rigid. The fertile hyphae and conidia are typically colored like the mycelium, though either, but not both, may be hyaline. Conidia are borne at the top or sides of the fertile hyphae, and are septate in a majority of the species. Many species grow on dead wood and other organic matter; but many also grow on living plants, in some cases causing serious injury to crops. Some are known to be conidial forms of ascomycetous fungi. These fungi are popularly called black molds.

Dematium (de-mat'i-um), n. [NL. < Gr. δῆματιον, dim. of δήμα(-), a bundle, a bend, < δῆμι, tie, bind.] A small genus of Dematiæ, in which the conidia are borne in chains on the sides of the fertile hyphae.

You sewers, carvers, ushers of the court,
Strained gentle for your fair demene,
Here I do take of you my last farewell.

Beau. and Fl., Woman-hater, III. 2.

With grave demene and solemn vanity.
West, On Travelling.

demean (dē-mēn'), v. t. [Improp. < de- + mean, base; orig. a misuse of demean.] To debase; lower; lower the dignity or standing of; demean. (This is in origin a misuse of demean by association with the adjective mean. Being thus illegitimate in origin and inconvenient in use, from its tendency to be confused with demean in its proper sense, the word is avoided by scrupulous writers. See demean.)

You see, scurrilous old—but I won't demean myself by naming what you are. Sheridan, The Duenna, I. 2.

It was of course Mrs. Sedley's opinion that her son would demean himself by a marriage with an artist's daughter. Thackeray, Vanity Fair, vi.

dementia (dē-men'shi), n. [L. dementia, madness, insanity, < demen(t)-, mad, insane: see dement, a. Cf. amentia.] An extremely low condition of the mental function; profound general mental incapacity. It may be congenital (idiocy) or acquired. Acquired dementia may be a primary insanity, or it may form the final stage of mania or melancholia. — Acute primary dementia, a form of temporary and often extreme dementia occurring in the young, usually before the twentieth year, and more often in girls than in boys, accompanied by general physical exhaustion, and ending on conditions likely to produce exhaustion, such as scanty or improper food, rapid growth, overwork, or dissipation. The prospect of complete recovery under proper treatment is very good. — Dementia paralytica, a chronic insanity beginning in slight failure of mind, slight change of character, and slight loss of muscular strength and accuracy of muscular adjustment, and proceeding, sometimes faster, sometimes slower, with occasional temporary improvement, to complete dementia and general paralysis. The sensory functions are likewise somewhat impaired. In its well-developed stages the disease is marked by delusions, especially of grandeur (megalomania), and by epileptiform or apopleptiform attacks often attended with local paralysis, frequently mending rapidly. It occurs usually between the ages of 35 and 50, and in 7 or 8 males to 1 female. Anatomically there is atrophy of the fibers of nervous network of the cerebral cortex and increase of the sustentacular tissue of the brain. demeane (de-mēn'), n. [Early mod. E. also demeane, prop. domain, demeane, < ME. demeaine, demeane, etc., < OF. domaine, demeine, etc., var. of domaine, right of ownership, power, dominion, domain: see domain and domain. The corrupt spelling demeane (cf. OF. demeane, demeine, corrupt spellings of domaine, demeine, adj., of a domain) has been preserved through legal conservatism.] 1. Power; dominion; possession. See domain.

Whether from the circumstances of their original formation, or from the prevalence of commendation to a lord for purposes of protection, the bulk of English villages were now "in demeane" — that is to say, in the "dominion" or lordship of some lord, or bishop, or in that of the crown itself.

J. R. Green, Conq. of Eng., p. 212.

2. A manor-house and the land adjacent or near, which a lord of the manor keeps in his own occupation, for the use of his family, as distinguished from his tenemental lands, distributed among his tenants, originally called bookland or charter-land, and folk-land or estates held in villeinage, from which sprang copyhold estates. Copyhold estates, however, have been accounted demeane, because the tenants are judged to have their estates only at the will of the lord.

The defects in those acts . . . have hitherto been wholly ineffectual, except about the demeane of a few gentlemen.

Swift.

3. Any estate in land.

A gentleman of noble parentage, Of fair demeane, youthful, and nobly train'd.

Shak., R. and J., III. 4.

My father's dead; I am a man of war too, Money, demeane; I have ships at sea too, captains.

Fletcher, Rule a Wife, I. 5.

The demeane of John, Lord of Biscay, . . . amounted to more than eighty towns and castles.

Prescott, Ford, and Isa, Int.

Ancient demeane, collectively, the manors that, according to the Domesday book, were actually in the hands of the crown at the time of Edward the Confessor or William the Conqueror, though they may have been subsequently granted to tenants. — Demeane lands, lands which the lord has not let out in tenancy, but has reserved for his own use and occupation.

The demeane lands of the crown . . . were abundantly sufficient to support its dignity and magnificence.

Hallam, Middle Ages, viii. 2.

In his demeane as of fee. See domain.

demeasial (de-mē-ni-āl), a. [L. demeasus + -ial.]

Pertaining to a demeasne. [Rare.]

Demetar (dē-mē'tēr), n. [L., < Gr. Δαμῆτρῆς, Doric Δαμῆτρῆς, usually explained as for Ἐμψύχῆς, < ψῆ, = Doric δα, earth, + μῆτρῆς = E. mother; but the identification of δα, which is found independently only in a few exclamatory phrases, with ψῆ, earth, is very doubtful.] In anc. Gr. myth., the goddess of vegetation and of useful Demeter of Cnidus, in the British Museum.

fruits, protectress of social order and of marriage: one of the great Olympian deities. She is usually associated, and even confounded, in legend and in cult, with her daughter Persephone (Proserpine) or Kore, whose rape by Hades (Pluto) symbolizes some of the most profound phases of Hellenic mysticism. The Romans of the end of the republic and of the empire assimilated to the Hellenic conception of Demeter the primitive Italic chthonian divinity Ceres.

demi (dē-mī'), n. Same as demy, 2.

demi<sup>1</sup>. [OF. F. demi, < OF. F. demi, half, < L. dimidius, half, < de-, apart, + medius, middle: see medial, middle. Cf. demy.] A prefix denoting 'half.' It occurs especially in technical terms taken from the French, many of them not Anglicized, especially in terms of heraldry, fortification, etc. It is also freely used as an English prefix. In heraldry the half of an animal used as a bearing is always the upper half, including the head and fore legs. Usually the creature is in an upright attitude, rampant, combatant, or the like.

demi-ass (dē-mī'-ās), n. A book-name of the hemion (Equus hemionus), translating the specific name.

Demi-Mon.

dem-i-brassart (dem-i-bras'grt), n. In plate-armor, the partial covering of the arm, usually worn over the sleeve of the hauberk; especially, that covering the upper arm at the back, as distinguished from the vambrace, which covered the arm below the elbow. Also demigarde-bras.

dem-i-cadence (dem-i-kā'dens), n. In music, a half cadence. It usually denotes the progression from tonic to dominant. See cadence.

dem-i-cannon (dem-i-kan'on), n. A name given to one of the larger kinds of heavy gun, as used in the latter part of the sixteenth century. It is said to have been a piece having a bore of 6½ inches, and throwing a shot weighing 32½ pounds. Some authors describe it as larger than this.

dem-i-caponiere (dem-i-kap-ō-nēr'), n. In fort., a ditch so arranged that a fire can be delivered from one side only. Also half-caponiere.

dem-i-carlino (dem-i-kār-lē'nō), n. A coin equal in value to half a carlino.

dem-i-caster (dem-i-kās'ter), n. 1. An inferior quality of beaver. Hence — 2. A hat made of beaver of this quality.

I know in that more subtil air of yours times sometimes passes for tissue, Venice beads for pearl, and dem-i-casters for beavers. Henslow, Letters, iii. 2.

dem-i-chamfron (dem-i-aham'fron), n. A variety of the chamfron that covered the head between the ears and the forehead as far as below the eyes. See chamfron.

dem-i-circule (dem-i-sēr-kl), n. A simple instrument for measuring and indicating angles, sometimes used as a substitute for the theodolite. It consists essentially of a graduated scale of half a circle, a movable rule pivoted on the center so as to sweep the graduated arc, and a compass to show the magnetic bearings. The two objects whose angle is to be measured are sighted along the rule and along the diameter of the scale. E. H. Knight.

dem-i-cuirass (dem-i-kwē'rās), n. The demi-placate or pansiere.

dem-i-culverin (dem-i-kul'ver-in), n. A kind of cannon in use in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. It is described as having a bore of 4½ inches and throwing a shot weighing 6½ pounds.

They had planted me three dem-i-culverins just in the mouth of the breach. B. Jonson, Every Man in His Humour, iii. 1.

One [piece of ordnance] . . . was exceeding great, and about sixteen fathoms long, made of brass, a dem-i-culverin. Coryat, Crudities, I. 125.

dem-i-deify (dem-i-dē'i-fi), v. t.; pret. and pp. dem-i-deified, ppr. dem-i-deifying. [dem-i- + deify.] To treat as a demigod. [Rare.]

Thus by degrees self-cheated of their sound And sober judgment that he is but man, They dem-i-deify and fume him so That in due season he forgets it too. Cowper, Task, v. 260.

dem-i-distance (dem-i-dis'tans), n. In fort., the distance between the outward polygons and the flank.

dem-i-ditone (dem-i-dī'tōn), n. In music, a minor third.

dem-i-farthing (dem-i-fār'wɪŋ), n. A coin of Ceylon current at the value of half an English farthing, or one fourth of a United States cent.

dem-i-galonier (dem-i-gal-ō-nēr'), n. A vessel for table use, apparently of the capacity of half a gallon. See galonier.

dem-i-hag, n. [Also dem-i-hake, dem-i-hague, < dem-i- + hag, "hake," hague, short for hackbut, hackbut.] A kind of firearm, a smaller kind of hackbut, in use in the second half of the sixteenth century. See hackbut.

The short gun, the hagbut, and the dem-i-haks were derivatives, in the natural order of evolution, from the bombards of Crecy and the more perfect pieces of artillery that had enabled Henry VII. to establish his supremacy over the remnant of the nobles left by the wars of the Roses. S. Dowell, Taxes in England, III. 222.

dem-i-island (dem-i-i'land), n. A peninsula.

The place from which the Turks were to have had the aforesaid booty was almost in manner an island . . . Thus was the Persian armie quite discomfited in this dem-i-island. Knox, Hist. Turin.

dem-i-jambe, n. A piece of armor covering the front of the leg only. Compare bainberg. Also called dem-i-grevière.

dem-i-John (dem-i-jon), n. [An acronym. (as if dem-i- + John) of F. damejoanne, a demijohn, an acronym. (as if Dame Joanne, Lady Jane) of Ar. damagan, a demijohn, said to be so called from Damagan, a town in northern Persia, once famous for its glass-works. The forced resemblance to John is in accordance with the humorous colloquial use of proper names as names for vessels; examples are Jack, Jill, and (prob.) Jug; see these words.] A large glass vessel or bottle with a bulging body and small neck, usually cased in wickerwork, but sometimes in a wooden box with a notch in the top extending over the neck of the vessel, for convenience in pouring out its contents.

dem-i-lance (dem-i-lāns), n. 1. A short and light spear introduced in the sixteenth century.

Light dem-i-lances from afar they throw, Fasten'd with leathern thongs to gull the foe. Dryden, Æneid.

2. A lightly armed horseman, especially one armed with a demi-lance. The demi-lances seem to have succeeded the hobbiers of the middle age, and to have been the prototypes of the more modern light horse.

Pedro, did you send for this tailor? or you, Moncodo? This light French dem-i-lance that follows us? Flotaker and Rowley, Maid in the Mill, III. 2.

To equip, in especial, as many dem-i-lances, or light horsemen, as they could, and to meet the Duke at Walden. R. W. Dixon, Hist. Church of Eng., xv.

3. The armor worn by such a horseman, consisting of open helmet, breast- and back-pieces, usually fitted with pauldrons, tassets, and, rarely, brassards or demi-brassards.

Also formerly demi-lance.

Transfer; transmission; devolution, as of a right or an estate in consequence of death, forfeiture of title, etc.

The great Convention resolved that King James having deserted the kingdom had by demise abdicated himself and wholly vacated his right. Frederick, Diary, Jan. 15, 1688.

2. In law, a conveyance or transfer of an estate by will or lease in fee, for life or for a term of years; in modern use, a lease for years. Hence — 3. Death, especially of a sovereign or other person transmitting important possessions or great fame: often used as a mere euphemism for death, without other implication.

So tender is the law of supposing even a possibility of his [the king's] death, that his natural dissolution is generally called his demise. Blackstone, Comm., I. 7.

The crown at the moment of demise must descend to the next heir. Macaulay.

Demise and redemise, a conveyance where there are mutual lease made from one to another of the same land or something out of it — Rya. 2. Death, Decease, Demise. See decease.

demise (dē-mis'), v.; pret. and pp. demised, ppr. demising. [< demies, n.] I. trans. 1. To bequeath; grant by will.

What state, what dignity, what honour
Canst thou demise to any child of mine?
Shak., Rich. III., iv. 4.

2. In law, to transfer or convey, as an estate, for life or for years; lease.

The governor and treasurer, by order of the general court, did demise to Edward Converse the ferry between Boston and Charlestown.

Wintrop, Hist. New England, II 427.

The words grant and demise in a lease for years create an implied warranty of title and a covenant for quiet enjoyment.

Justice Swanwick, 22 U. S., 109.

II. intrans. To pass by bequest or inheritance; descend, as property.

Now arose a difficulty—whether the property of the late King demised to the king or to the crown.

Greville, Memoirs, Jan. 8, 1832.

demiurge (dem-i-erj), n. [< L. demiurgus, < Gr. δημιουργός, contr. of earlier (Epic) δημιουργός, lit. a worker for the people, a handicraftsman, a skilled workman, a maker, an architect, the Maker of the world, the Creator (see def.), < δημιουργός, of the people (< δημιουργός, the people), + εργον, work, εργον, a work, = E. work.] 1. A maker or creator; the Creator of the world; specifically, a supernatural being imagined by some as the creator of the world in subordination to the Supreme Being. In the Gnostic system the Demiurge (also called Archon, and Jaldabaoth, or son of Chaos) was represented as the chief of the lowest order of spirits or sons of the Hieronymus. Mingling with Chaos, he evolved from it a corporeal animated world. He could not, however, impart to man the true soul or pneuma, but only a sensuous one, psyche. He was identified with the Jehovah of the Jews, and was by some regarded as the originator of evil.

God defined as First Cause . . . would not be God, but a demiurge, or subordinately creative deity, created to create the world. Hodge, Phil. of Religion, III. xl. § 4.

It is much easier to believe that in some way unknown to our finite intelligence the power and goodness of God are compatible with the existence of evil than that the world is the work of an inferior demiurge or other demon.

Edinburgh Rev.

The Gnostics agreed in attributing the world in which we live to an Angel, or a demiurge, inferior to the Infinite God. G. P. Fisher, Begin. of Christianity, p. 285.

2. In some Peloponnesian states of ancient Greece, one of a class of public officers who in some cases appear to have constituted the chief executive magistracy.

demiurgeus (dem-i-er-jus), a. [< demiurge + -ous.] Of the nature of or resembling a demiurge; of demiurgic character. [Rare.]

There is, in our drunken land, a certain privilege extended to drunkenness. . . . Our demiurgeus Mrs. Grundy smiles apologetically on its victims.

R. L. Stevenson, Familiar Studies of Men and Books, Pref.

demiurgical (dem-i-er'jik, -ji-kaj), a. [< L. as if demiurgicus, < Gr. δημιουργικός, < δημιουργός, demiurge; see demiurge.] Pertaining to a demiurge, or to the act or process of creation.

Far beyond all other political powers of Christianity is the demiurgical power of this religion over the kingdoms of human opinion.

De Quincey.

To play the part of a demiurge was a delight to Shelley; even to have an interest in the demiurgical effort was no mean happiness.

E. Dowden, Shelley, II. 304.

demi-vambrace (dem-i-vam'brās), n. In armor, a plate of iron protecting the outside of the forearm, and adjusted over a sleeve of mail or a sleeve of gamboused work.

demi-vill (dem-i-vil), n. In law, a half-vill, consisting of five freemen or frank-pledges.

demi-volt (dem-i-volt), n. [< F. demi-volte, < demi-, half, + volte, a leap, vault; see volt.] In the manege, one of the seven artificial motions of a horse, in which he makes a half turn with the fore legs raised.

Fitz-Burton, . . . making demi-volts in air,
Cried, "Where's the coward that would not dare
To fight for such a land?"
Scott, Marmion, iv. 20.

demi-wolf (dem-i-wulf), n.; pl. demi-wolves (wulvz). A half-wolf; a mongrel between a dog and a wolf.

Spaniards, curs,
Shoughs, water-rugs, and demi-wolves, are cloyed
All by the name of dogs.
Shak., Macbeth, III. 1.

demobilisation (dē-mō-bi-li-sā'shōn), n. [< F. démobilisation, < démobiliser, mobilize; see mobilize.] The act of disbanding troops; the reduction of military armaments to a peace footing; the condition of being demobilized, and not liable to be moved on service. Also written demobilization. See mobilization.

demobilize (dē-mō-bi-li-sē), v. t.; pret. and pp. demobilized, ppr. demobilizing. [< F. démobiliser, < dé-priv. + mobiliser, mobilize; see mobilize.] To disband; change from a condition of mobilization. Also written demobilise.

democracy (dē-mok'rā-si), n.; pl. democracies (-sies). [Formerly democracy, democrat; < OF. démocracie, F. démocracie (i pron. s) = Sp. Pg. democracia = It. democrazia = D. G. demokratie = Dan. Sw. demokrati, < Gr. δημοκρατία, popular government (cf. δημοκρατία, have popular government), < δημο-, the people, + κρατία, rule, be strong, < κράτος, strength, < κράς, strong, = Goth. hardus = E. hard, q. v.] 1. Government by the people; a system of government in which the sovereign power of the state is vested in the people as a whole, and is exercised directly by them or their elected agents.

The majority, having the whole power of the community, may employ all that power in making laws, and executing those laws; and there the form of the government is a perfect democracy.

Locke.

In this open democracy [of the town meeting], every opinion had utterance; every objection, every fact, every acre of land, every bushel of rye, its entire weight.

Emerson, Hist. Discourse at Concord.

2. A state or civil body in which the people themselves exercise all legislative authority, and confer all executive and judicial powers, either by direct collective action or through elected representatives. Athens and some of the other ancient Greek states, and within the limits of their power, the canton of Appenzel in Switzerland and the towns of the northern United States, are instances of democracies of the first class. In democratic republics generally, however, all power is exercised by delegated authority. See republic.

3. Political and social equality in general; a state of society in which no hereditary differences of rank or privilege are recognized: opposed to aristocracy.

Rank nor name nor pomp has he
In the grave's democracy.

Whittier, Grave by the Lake.

4. [cap.] In U. S. polit. hist.: (a) The system of principles held by the Democratic party. See democratic. (b) The members of the Democratic party collectively.

[The Missouri controversy] was a political movement for the balance of power, balked by the Northern Democracy, who saw their own overthrow, and the eventual separation of the States, in the establishment of geographical parties divided by a slavery and anti-slavery line.

T. H. Benton, Thirty Years, I. 10.

5. In a collective sense, the people; especially, the people regarded as exercising political powers.

Thence to the famous orators repair,
Those ancient, whose restless eloquence Wielded at will that fierce democracy.

Milton, P. R., iv. 299.

Social democracy. See social.

democrat (dem-ō-krat), n. [= *D. demokrat = G. Dan. Sw. demokrat, < F. démocrate = Sp. demócrata = Pg. democrata, < NL. *democrata, < Gr. δημοκρατία, base of δημοκρατία, < δημο-, the people, + κρατία, rule, be strong, < κράτος, strength, < κράς, strong, = Goth. hardus = E. hard, q. v.*] 1. One who believes in or adheres to democracy as a principle of government or of organized society; one who believes in political and natural equality; an opponent of arbitrary or hereditary distinctions of rank and privilege: opposed to aristocrat.

Like most women of first-rate ability, she was at bottom a democrat; rank was her convenience, but she had no respect for it or belief in it.

J. Hawthorne, Dust, p. 127.

2. [cap.] A member of the Democratic party in the United States.

The name Democrat, now in use by one of the great parties North and South, was originally a term of reproach, like that of Jacobin, and subsequently like that of Locofoco, and has been freely accepted at the South only since the Revolution.

Quoted by Thurston Wood, Antislavery, p. 126.

8. A light wagon without a top, containing several seats, and usually drawn by two horses. Originally called democratic wagon. [Western and Middle U. S.]—social democrat. See social. democratic (dem-ō-kra-tī'k), a. [= F. démocratique = Sp. dem. p. it. democrático (cf. D. demokratik) = G. demokratisch = Dan. Sw. demokratisk] < NL. **democratia*, < Gr. δημοκρατία, < δημος, democracy; see democrat.] 1. Pertaining to or characteristic of democracy as a principle of government.

The democratic theory is that those constitutions are likely to prove steadiest which have the broadest base, that the right to vote makes a safety-valve of every voter, and that the best way of teaching a man how to vote is to give him the chance of practice. Lowell, Democracy.

9. [esp. or l. c.] In U. S. politics, of pertaining to, or characteristic of the Democratic party; being a supporter of the Democratic party; as, a Democratic newspaper; the Democratic platform; a Democratic convention.

He was democratic, not in the modern sense of the term, as never holding a caucus nomination, and never thinking differently from the actual administration; but on principle, as founded in a strict, in contradiction to a latitudinarian, construction of the constitution. T. H. Benton, Thirty Years, II. 128.

8. Pertaining to or characteristic of democracy as a social principle; maintaining or manifesting equal natural rights and privileges; hence, free from forced inequality or servility; being on a common level: opposed to aristocratic; as, a democratic community or assemblage; democratic manners.—Democratic party, a political party of the United States, whose distinctive principles are strict construction of the constitution with respect to the powers delegated to the general government and their reserved to the States, and the least possible interference of government with individual and local liberty of action. Hence it has opposed national centralization, supported liberal extensions of the electoral franchise, advocated low tariff duties with a view to revenue rather than protection, and contended for close limitation of the objects of public expenditure. It was at first known as the Anti-Federal party, then took the name of Republican, and finally (about 1796) that of Democratic-Republican, which is still its formal designation; but it was many years before Democratic was generally accepted as its shortened name instead of Republican, the change beginning about 1810. See Republicans.

democratical (dem-ō-kra-tī'kal), a. and a. I. a. Characterized by democracy; of a democratic nature or tendency; democratic.

Although their condition and fortunes may place them many spheres above the multitude, yet are they still within the line of vulgarities, and the democratical enemies of truth. St. T. Brown, Pseud. Epist. (1646), I. iv. 12.

Every expansion of the scheme of government they [the framers of the American Constitution] elaborated has been in a democratical direction. Lowell, Democracy.

II. a. Same as democrat, 1. Hobbes. democratically (dem-ō-kra-tī'kal-i), adv. In a democratic manner.

The democratical embassy was democratically received. Algernon Sidney.

In Gr. myth., a supernatural agent or intelligence, lower in rank than a god; a spirit holding a middle place between gods and men; one of a class of ministering spirits, sometimes regarded as including the souls of deceased persons; a genius; as, the demon or good genius of Socrates. Sometimes written dæmon.

Thy dæmon (that's thy spirit which keeps thee) is Noble, courageous, high, unmatchable. Shak., A. and C., II. 2.

Those Demons that are found
In fire, air, flood, or under ground,
Whose power hath a true consent
With planet, or with element.

Milton, 11 Penseroso, l. 23.

Soon was a world of holy Demons made,
Aerial spirits, by great Jove design'd
To be on earth the guardians of mankind.

T. Moore, tr. of Hesiod's Works and Days, l.

A demon, in the philosophy of Plato, though inferior to a deity, was not an evil spirit, and it is extremely doubtful whether the existence of evil demons was known to either of the Greeks or Romans till about the time of the advent of Christ.

Lecky, Europ. Morals, l. 404.

2. An evil spirit; a devil: from the belief of the early Christian world that all the divinities of the pagans were devils.

If that same demon, that hath gull'd thee thus,
Should with his lion gait walk the whole world,
He might return to vasty Tartar lack,
And tell the legions, I can never win
A soul so easy as that Englishman's.

Shak., Hen. V., ll. 2.

Germany and England, in demonetizing silver, have created a money pressure there unparalleled in our times.

N. A. Rev., CXLIII, 101.

demoniac (dē-mō'ni-ak), a. and n. [ME. demoniak = F. démoniaque = Pr. demoniag, demoniat = Sp. Pg. It. demoniaco, < LL. demoniacus, < Gr. as if **daimoniakos*, for which only daimoniakos (whence LL. demoniacus, E. demoniac), < daimon, a god, genius, spirit: see demon.] 1. a. 1. Pertaining to a demon or spirit.

He, all unarm'd,
Shall chase thee, with the terror of his voice,
From thy demoniac holds.

Milton, P. R., iv. 628.

2. Produced by demons; influenced by demons. Demoniac phrensy, moping melancholy.

Milton, P. L., xl. 485.

3. Of the character of a demon; acting as if possessed by demons; wild; frantic; extremely wicked or cruel.

II. n. 1. One who is supposed to be possessed by a demon; one whose volition and other mental faculties seem to be overpowered, restrained, or disturbed in their regular operation by an evil spirit; specifically, a lunatic.

Having and blaspheming incessantly, like a demoniac, he came to the court.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng.

In the synagogue was a demoniac, a lunatic with that dual consciousness which sprang out of a real or supposed possession by an evil spirit.

G. P. Fisher, Begin. of Christianity, p. 457.

2. [cap.] One of a section of the Anabaptists who maintained that the devils would ultimately be saved. Imp. Dict.

demoniacal (dē-mō'ni-ak-al), a. Of demoniac character or origin; like a demon; demoniac. — Demoniacal possession, possession by demons or evil spirits. In the New Testament, especially the Gospels, persons are spoken of as being possessed with devils. By the Rationalistic school of writers these are regarded as insane persons, whose condition the popular belief of the time ascribed to the influence of evil spirits; by evangelical writers it is believed that evil spirits actually exercised a controlling influence over the spirits of men in the time of Christ, and that his superior power was attested by casting these evil spirits out.

demoniacally (dē-mō'ni-ak-al-i), adv. In a demoniacal manner; as a demoniac.

demoniacism (dē-mō'ni-ak-izm), n. [demoniac + -ism.] The state of being a demoniac; the practices of demoniacs.

demonial (dē-mō'ni-al), a. [OF. demonial, < *ML. *demonialis*, < Gr. daimonios, of or belonging to a demon, < daimon, demon: see demon.] Of the nature or character of a demon; relating or pertaining to a demon; characteristic of or performed by a demon or demons. [Rare.]

No man who acknowledges demoniacal things can deny demons.

Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 264.

demonian (dē-mō'ni-an), a. [As demoniacal + -an.] Having the qualities or characteristics of a demon. [Rare.]

Demoniac spirits now, from the element
Each of his reign allotted, rightlier call'd Powers of fire, air, water, and earth beneath.

Milton, P. R., ll. 122.

demonianism (dē-mō'ni-an-izm), n. [demonian + -ism.] The state of being possessed by a demon. [Rare.]

The teachers of the gospel in the fullness of their inspiration must needs be secure from an error which so dreadfully affected the religion they were entrusted to propagate as demonianism did, if it were an error.

Warburton, Divine Legation, ix., notes.

demonism (dē-mō'ni-izm), n. [Gr. as if **daimoniakos*, < daimonios, also daimonios, be under the power of a demon, < daimon, demon: see demon.] The state of being under demoniacal influence; possession by a demon. [Rare.]

What remained but to ascribe both to enthusiasm or demonism? Warburton, Sermons, p. 255. [Latham.]

demoniac (dē-mon'ik), a. [Gr. daimoniakos, < daimon, a demon: see demon.] Pertaining to or like a demon; demoniac. Also demonice.

He may even show sudden impulses which have a false air of demoniac strength, because they seem inexplicable.

George Eliot, Daniel Deronda, xv.

demonifuge (dē-mon'i-fūj), n. [LL. demon, a demon, + fugare, put to flight.] A charm or protection against demons.

Of these, Isabella . . . I hope was wrapped in the friar's garment; for few stood more in need of a demonifuge.

Pennant, London, p. 271.

demonism (dē'mon-izm), n. [= F. démonisme; as demon + -ism.] Belief in the existence of demons; character or action like that of demons.

The established theology of the heathen world . . . rested upon the basis of demonism.

Farmer, Demonicas of New Testament, l. § 7.

demonist (dē'mon-ist), n. [demon + -ist.] A believer in or worshiper of demons.

To believe the governing mind or minds not absolutely and necessarily good, nor confined to what is best, but capable of acting according to mere will or fancy, is to be a demonist.

Shaftesbury.

demonize (dē'mon-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. demonized, ppr. demonizing. [ML. demoniacare, make demoniac, < Gr. daimonizō, be under the power of a tutelary deity or spirit, in N. T. be possessed by a demon.] To subject to the influence of demons; make like a demon; render demoniacal or diabolical.

Man's choices free or fetter, elevate or debase, delly or demonize his humanity.

Alcott, Tablets, p. 184.

Christ is now [in his temptation] to have his part in a state demonized by evil.

Bushnell, Forgiveness and Law, p. 152.

demonocracy (dē-mon-ok'ra-si), n. [= F. démonocratie, < Gr. daimon, a demon, + -kratia, government, < κρατειν, rule, be strong.] The power or government of demons.

demonographer (dē-mon-og'ra-fēr), n. [= F. démonographe; < demonography + -er.] A writer on demons and demonology; a demonologist.

The demonographers of the sixteenth to the eighteenth century continually allude to the flight of Simon Magus across the Forum as effected by the aid of demons.

N. and Q., 6th ser., ix. 4.

demonography (dē-mon-og'ra-fi), n. [= F. démonographie = Pg. demonographia, < Gr. daimon, demon, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write.] The descriptive stage of demonology. O. T. Mason.

demonolater (dē-mon-ol'ā-tēr), n. [= F. démonolâtre, < Gr. daimon, a demon, + -λατρεω, < λατρεω, worship. Cf. idolater.] A demon-worshiper.

Certain demonolaters in the present day, as far as the outward evidence of their affliction goes, display as plain signs of demoniacal possession as ever were displayed 1800 years ago.

Sp. Caldwell, quoted in Oxbam's Short Studies, p. 441.

demonolatry (dē-mon-ol'ā-tri), n. [= F. démonolatrie = Sp. demonolatria = Pg. demonolatria, < Gr. daimon, a demon, + -λατρεία, worship.] The worship of evil spirits; the worship of evil personified as a devil.

Demonolatry, Devil-dancing, and Demoniacal possession.

Sp. Caldwell, Contemporary Rev., Feb., 1876.

demonology (dē-mon-ol'ā-jī), n. [demon + -ology + -y.] A demonologist. Norri.

demonologic, demonological (dē'mon-ol'og'ik, -l'og-i), a. Pertaining to demonology. demonologist (dē'mon-ol'og'ist), n. [demonology + -ist.] One versed in demonology. demonology (dē'mon-ol'og-i), n. [= F. démonologie, < Gr. daimon, a demon, + -λογία, < λογειν, speak: see -ology.] 1. A discourse or treatise on demons; an account of evil spirits and their character, agency, etc.

Demonology, the branch of the science of religion which relates to demons, is much obscured in the treatises of old writers.

Encyc. Brit., VII. 54.

2. The study of popular superstitions concerning demons or evil spirits.

demonomancy (dē'mon-om'ā-nj), n. [Gr. daimon, a demon, + μάντις, magic, a magician: see magic.] Magic dependent upon the agency of demons. [Rare.]

The author had rifled all the stores of demonomancy to furnish out an entertainment.

Sp. Hurd.

demonomancy (dē'mon-ō-man-si), n. [F. démonomancie, < Gr. daimon, demon, + μαντεία, divination.] Divination while under the influence or inspiration of the devil or of demons.

demonomania (dē'mon-ō-mā'ni-ā), n. [= F. démonomanie = Pg. demonomania, < NL. demonomania, < Gr. daimon, a demon, + μανία, mania.] In pathol., a kind of mania in which the patient fancies himself possessed by devils.

demonomist (dē'mon-ō-mist), n. [demonomy + -ist.] One who lives in subjection to the devil or to evil spirits.

demonomy (dē'mon-ō-mi), n. [Gr. daimon, a demon, + -νομία (cf. νόμος, law), < νέμειν, regulate.] 1. The dominion of demons or evil spirits.—2. The deductive and predictive stage of demonology. O. T. Mason.

demonopathy (dē'mon-ōp'ā-thi), n. [Gr. daimon, demon, + πάθος, suffering.] Demonomania.

demonopolize (dē-mō-nop'ō-līz), v. t.; pret. and pp. demonopolized, ppr. demonopolizing. [demonopolize + -ation.] To destroy the monopoly of; withdraw from the power of monopoly.

Since the expiry of the contract the mines of Colombia have been demonopolized.

Encyc. Brit., VI. 154.

demonry (dē'mon-ri), n. [demon + -ry.] Demoniacal influence. [Rare.]

What demonry, thinkest thou, possesses Varus?

J. Bullie.

demonship (dē'mon-ship), n. [demon + -ship.] The state of being a demon.

demonstrability (dē-mon-strā-bil'i-ti), n. Demonstrableness.

demonstrable (dē-mon-strā-bl), a. [= Sp. demostrable = Pg. demonstravel, < LL. demonstrabilis, < L. demonstrare: see demonstrate.] Capable of being demonstrated; susceptible of being proved beyond doubt or contradiction.

The grand articles of our belief are as demonstrable as geometry.

Glanville, Socp. Sci.

It is demonstrable that light cannot reach our system from the nearest of the fixed stars in less than five years, and telescopes disclose to us objects probably many times more remote.

Sir J. Herschel, in Tyndall's Light and Heat, p. 21.

demonstrableness (dē-mon-strā-bl-ness), n. The quality of being demonstrable.

demonstrably (dē-mon-strā-bl-i), adv. In a demonstrable manner; so as to demonstrate; beyond the possibility of doubt; manifestly.

He should have compelled his ministers to execute the law in cases that demonstrably concerned the public peace.

Clarendon, Great Rebellion.

demonstrance (dē-mon-strāns), n. [ME. demonstrance, < OF. demonstrance, demonstrance (= It. dimostranza), < NL. as if **demonstrantia*, < L. demonstrantia], ppr. of demonstrare, demonstrate: see demonstrate. Cf. demonstrance.] Demonstration; proof; exhibition of the truth of a proposition. Holland.

He layed them in the myde of the cytt, and abode the demonstrance of god.

Holy Booc (R. E. T. S.), p. 128.

If one or a few sinful acts were a sufficient demonstration of an hypocrite, what would become of all the elect, even the best recorded in Scripture?

R. Junier, Cure of Misprision.

demonstratable (dē-mon-strā-tā-bl), a. [demonstrate + -able.] Capable of being demonstrated; demonstrable. [Rare.]

It is a fact dynamically demonstratable that the total amount of vis viva in any moving system abandoned to the mutual reaction of its particles . . . has a maximum value which it cannot exceed, and a minimum below which it cannot descend.

Herschel, Pop. Lectures, p. 468.

demonstrate (dē-mon' or dem'gn-strāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. demonstrated, ppr. demonstrating. [L. demonstratus, pp. of demonstrare

(*) Sp. demonstrare = Pg. demonstrare = It. dimostrare = D. demonstrare = G. demonstrare = Dan. demonstrere = Sw. demonstrera, point out, indicate, designate, show, < de + monstrare, show: see monstration, monster. Cf. remonstrate.] 1. To point out; indicate; make evident; exhibit.

How he lov'd the People, other Arguments then affected sayings must demonstrate. Milton, Miltonicisms, ix.

For the Gardens, one may safely affirm that if Solomon made them in the Rocky ground which is now assign'd for them, he demonstrated greater power and wealth in finishing his design, than he did wisdom in choosing the place for it. Maudsley, Aleppo to Jerusalem, p. 30.

Specifically.—2. To exhibit, describe, and explain, as the parts of a dissected body; teach by the ocular use of examples, as a physical science, especially anatomy or any of its principles.—3. To establish the truth of; fully establish by arguments; adduce convincing reasons for belief in, as a proposition.

As the proving of these two things will overthrow all atheism, so it will likewise lay a clear foundation for the demonstrating of a deity distinct from the corporeal world. Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 145.

demonstration (dem-on-strā'shən), n. [ME. demonstracion, < OF. demonstracion, demonstracion, F. démonstration = Sp. demostracion = Pg. demonstratio = It. dimostrazione = D. demonstratio = G. Dan. Sw. demonstratio, < L. demonstratio = de + monstrare, point out: see demonstrate.] 1. The act of pointing out or exhibiting; an exhibition; a manifestation; a show: as, a demonstration of friendship or sympathy.

Did your letters pierce the queen to any demonstration of grief? Shak., Lear, iv. 2.

2. The exhibition and explanation of examples in teaching an art or a science, especially anatomy.—3. Milit., an exhibition of warlike intentions; a warlike attitude or movement; specifically, a military operation of any kind which may be performed for the purpose of deceiving the enemy respecting the measures which it is intended to employ against him.

He was compelled by the national spirit to make a demonstration of war. Hallam.

If any uncertainty remains as to the enemy's disposition, demonstrations should be made generally along the front, to oblige him to show his hand. Macdougall, Modern Warfare, viii.

4. A public exhibition, by a number of persons, of sympathy with some political or other cause, as in a mass-meeting or a procession.—5. Proof, either (a) a process of stating in an orderly manner indubitable propositions which evidently cannot be true without the truth of the conclusion so proved, or (b) the propositions so stated. Properly, demonstration is restricted to perfect proof, especially mathematical proof. (See the extract from Burgess's Logic, below.) According to the Aristotelian doctrine, which has greatly influenced the use of the word, demonstration must be drawn from principles not only self-evident, but also undervived from any higher principles, and the conclusion must not only be shown to be true, but also to be a mere special case of the truth of one or more of the principles from which it is derived. It was supposed that this was the character of the best mathematical proofs; but mathematical proof consists in constructing a diagram or formula according to certain rules which prescribe that certain relations shall exist between the parts of that diagram, and then in showing by observation (directly or indirectly) that certain additional relations exist between those parts; and no important mathematical proof is of the nature of the Aristotelian demonstration. The word has consequently acquired two significations: first, its original sense of a perfect mathematical proof; second, the sense of a proof drawn from principles, as in the Aristotelian theory. There is also a third signification, according to which a demonstration is any proof which leaves no room for reasonable doubt, such as Kepler's proof that the orbit of Mars is an ellipse. Writers who adopt the Aristotelian view hold that the reductio ad absurdum and the Permatian mode of proof, though entirely convincing, are not perfect demonstrations.

Some an admirable delight drew to Musicks; and some, the certainty of demonstration to the Mathematicians. Shak., Sidney, Apol. for Poetrie.

Demonstration is a syllogism made of such propositions as are true, first immediately, and manifestly known, and be the causes of the conclusion. First and immediate here is all one, signifying such propositions as need not be proved or made more evident by any other former propositions. Burges's.

Demonstration, in the Greek ἀποδείξις, is amongst the geometricals a delineation of a diagram, in which they exhibit the truth of their propositions to be seen by the eye. To that is opposed pseudographema: that is, a description or false delineation. Now these words, as many others, which are used in the doctrine of syllogisms, are translated from geometry into logic; and there demonstration is taken sometimes for any certain and perspicuous proof, but here in this place strictly for syllogism scientie, and pseudographema, or false syllogism, for syllogism begetting error or contrary to science. Burges's, Logic, tr. by a Gentleman.

Demonstration [is] nothing but the perception of such agreement [of ideas] by the intervention of other ideas or mediums. Locke, Human Understanding, IV. iv. 7.

Direct demonstration, demonstration rebus, or demonstrative quia, a proof proceeding from the true cause of the fact proved.—Indirect demonstration, demonstration rebus, or demonstrative quod, a proof which does not show the true cause of the fact proved.—Ostensive demonstration, in math., a demonstration which plainly and directly demonstrates the truth of a proposition.

demonstrative (dē-mon'strā-tiv), a. and n. [ME. demonstratif, < F. démonstratif = Pr. demonstrativus = Sp. demostrativo = Pg. demonstrativo = It. dimostrativo, < L. demonstrativus, < de + monstrare, point out: see demonstrate.] 1. a. Exhibiting or indicating with clearness: as, a demonstrative figure in painting.—2. In rhet., expressing or explaining with clearness, force, and beauty.—3. Characterized by or given to the strong exhibition of any feeling or quality; energetically expressive: as, a demonstrative manner; a demonstrative person.

May hasn't been too officious about me and too demonstrative. Dickens, Cricket on the Hearth.

4. Pertaining to or of the nature of proof; having the power of proving or demonstrating; indubitably conclusive: as, a demonstrative argument; demonstrative reasoning.

A syllogism demonstrative is that which is made of necessary, immediate, true, certain, and infallible propositions, being first and so known as they need none other proof. Blundeville.

It is impossible by any solid or demonstrative reasons to persuade a man to believe the conversion of the needle to the north. Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, l. 45.

Probations are demonstrative in the stricter sense of that term when the certainty they necessitate is absolute and complete: that is, when the opposite alternative involves a contradiction. Sir W. Hamilton.

Demonstrative certainty. See certainty.—Demonstrative judgment, a judgment in which something is held to be necessarily proved.—Demonstrative legacy. See legacy.—Demonstrative pronoun, in gram., a pronoun that points to, rather than defines or describes, the object to which it relates: the name is applied to English this, that, you, and to their correspondents in other languages.—Demonstrative root, a name sometimes applied to the pronominal roots in general, as implying position and direction rather than quality.

II. a. A demonstrative pronoun.
demonstratively (dē-mon'strā-tiv-ly), adv. 1. In a manner to prove or demonstrate; with proof which cannot be questioned; with certainty; convincingly.

First, I demonstratively prove That feet were only made to move. Prior.

No man, he [Plato] thought, could see clearly and demonstratively what was right and what was wrong and not accordingly. Adam Smith, Moral Sentiments, vii. 2.

2. In a demonstrative manner; with energetic exhibition of feeling: as, he spoke very demonstratively.

demonstrativeness (dē-mon'strā-tiv-ness), n. The quality of being demonstrative, in any of its senses.

demonstrator (dem-on'strā-tor), n. [= F. démonstrateur, < OF. demonstrator = Sp. demostrador = Pg. demonstrador = It. dimostratore, < L. demonstrator, < de + monstrare, point out: see demonstrate.] 1. One who points out, exhibits, or explains by examples; specifically, in anat., one who exhibits, describes, and explains the parts when dissected; a teacher of practical anatomy.

In 1806, he [Sir Benjamin Brodie] assisted Mr. Wilson in teaching anatomy, and in 1809 officiated as demonstrator. Gallery of Medicine, Sir B. Brodie.

2. One who demonstrates; one who proves anything with certainty or with indubitable evidence.

Whether an algebraist, Saxonist, geometrician, or demonstrator of any kind, can expect indulgence for obscure principles or incorrect reasonings. Sp. Barthelemy, Analyst, xlii.

3. The index finger. Dunlop.
demonstratorship (dem-on'strā-tor-ship), n. [< demonstrator + -ship.] The position or office of a demonstrator in anatomy.

When Valaiva was transferred to Parma, Morgagni succeeded to his anatomical demonstratorship. Emper, Brit., XVI. 322.

demonstratory (dē-mon'strā-tō-ri), a. [< L. demonstratorius, < L. demonstrator: see demonstrator.] Tending to demonstrate; demonstrative. [Rare.]

demoralize, a. An obsolete form of demurage.
demoralization (dē-mor'al-izā'shən), n. [= F. démoralisation = Sp. demoralización = Pg. demoralização = It. demoralizzazione; as demoralize + -ation.] The act of demoralizing, or the state of being demoralized. Also spelled demoralization.

The cause [of the crimes of the Crocians] is to be found in the existence of slavery; and the invariable demoralization which this accursed practice produces is not checked by any system of religious teaching. Quarterly Rev., Nov., 1810.

The demoralization among the Confederates from their defeats at Henry and Donelson, their long marches from Bowling Green, Columbus, and Nashville, and their failure at Shiloh, . . . was so great that a stand for the time would have been impossible.

U. S. Grant, Personal Memoirs, I. 374.

demoralize (dē-mor'al-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. demoralized, ppr. demoralizing. [= F. démoraliser = Sp. Pg. demoralizar = It. demoralizzare = D. demoraliseren = G. demoralisieren = Dan. demoralisere = Sw. demoralisera; as deprive + moral + -ize.] 1. To corrupt or undermine the morals of; weaken or destroy the effect of moral principles on.

When the Doctor [Noah Webster] was asked how many words he had coined for his Dictionary, he replied, only one, "to demoralize," and that . . . in a pamphlet published in the last century.

Sir C. Lyell, Travels in the United States, p. 33.

It is always demoralizing to extend the domain of sentiment over questions where it has no legitimate jurisdiction. Lowell, Study Windows, p. 158.

2. To deprive of spirit or energy; dishearten; destroy the courage, confidence, or hope of; render incapable of brave or energetic effort: specifically used in relation to troops: as, the charge of our cavalry completely demoralized the enemy's left wing.

But war often for a time exhausts and demoralizes, it sometimes perpetuates injustice. It is occasionally undertaken against the clearest provisions of the law of nations. Woolsey, Intro. to Inter. Law, § 303.

3. To throw into confusion in general; bring into disorder; confuse mentally: as, he was badly demoralized by fright. [Colloq.]

Also spelled demoralise.
demus (dē'mos), n. [< Gr. δῆμος, the people: see demos.] 1. In Gr. antiqu., the people; the public; the commonwealth.—2. The populace; the common people.

Only thus is there hope of arresting the general defection from the religious life observable both in the intellectual classes and through large strata of the Demos. Contemporary Rev., I. 25.

Also demus.
Demospongia (dē-mō-spon'jā-s), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. δῆμος, the people (see demos), & σπῆγος, sponge.] In Sollas's classification of sponges, a subclass of Sclerospogon in which sixradial spicules are absent. It is divided into two orders, Monaxonida and Tetraxonellida.
demospsonian (dē-mō-spon'jā-n), a. and n. 1. a. Of or pertaining to the Demospongia.

II. n. One of the Demospongia.
Demosthenian, Demosthenean (dē-mos-thē-ni-an, dē-mos-thē-nē-an), a. Same as Demosthenic.

Emphatic and abnormal position of single words and phrases was a distinctly Demosthenian device, to prick his hearers as it were, and keep their attention at a high degree of tension. Tracy, Amer. Philol. Ass., XVI. 127.

Demosthenic (dē-mos-then'ik), a. [< L. Demosthenicus, < Demosthenes, < Gr. Δημοσθένης, a celebrated orator. The name means 'strong with the people,' < δῆμος, the people, + σθένος, strength.] Pertaining to or characteristic of Demosthenes, a celebrated Athenian orator and patriot (384–322 B. C.), especially famous for his "Philippics," or orations delivered against the encroachments of Philip, king of Macedonia.

demotic (dē-mot'ik), a. [= F. démotique = Sp. demótico, < Gr. δημοτικός, of or for the common people, popular, democratic, < δῆμος, one of the common people, < δῆμος, the common people. Cf. democratic.] Popular; pertaining to the common people: specifically applied to a certain mode of writing used in Egypt for epistolary and business purposes from about the seventh century B. C., as distinguished from the hieratic and hieroglyphic. Also called enchorial.

In Egyptian writing the demotic or enchorial system is a corruption of the hieratic. Ferris, Language, xlii.

It [the Rosetta stone] was engraved in three sets of characters, the first being in the ancient hieroglyphics, the second in the more recent and popular language and characters called demotic, and the third in the Greek. H. S. Osborn, Ancient Egypt, p. 19.

dempt, v. t. An obsolete form of dema. Chaucer.

dempter, n. See demester.
dempt (dempt). [ME. dempt, contr. of demed, pp. of demon, deem, judge: see deem.] An obsolete preterit and past participle of deem.
Till partial Paris dempt it Venus dew. Spenser, F. Q., II. vii. 55.

Therefore, Sir knight, Arise what course of you is safest dempt. Spenser, F. Q., III. xi. 25.

demulso (dē-mul'sō), v. t. [Fr. demulso, < L. demulso, stroke down, soften, < de, down, + mulso, stroke, allay.] To soothe, mollify, or pacify.

Wherewith Saturn was demulso and appeased.

Sir T. Rhyet, The Governour, fol. 64.

demulso (dē-mul'sōnt), a. and n. [= Sp. demulso, < L. demulso, < de, down, + mulso, stroke, allay.] I. a. Softening; mollifying; soothing: as, a demulso medicine.

There are other substances, which are opposite to both sorts of acrimony, which are called demulso or mild.

Arbuthnot, Aliments, v.

II. n. Any medicine which assuages the effects of irritation; that which softens, soothes, or mollifies, as gums, oils, flaxseed, and other mucilaginous substances.

It [gum-acacia] is much used in medicine as a simple demulso, for lubricating abraded surfaces.

A. G. F. Rhyet James, Indian Industries, p. 171.

demulso (dē-mul'shōn), n. [An erroneous form (by confusion with emulsion, q. v.) for **demulso*, < L. as if **demulso* (n), < demulso, pp. of demulso, stroke: see demulso.] 1. The act of soothing or imparting comfort or content.—2. That which soothes or contents; flat-tary.

Vice garlanded with all the soft demulsions of a present contentment.

Pelham, Resolves, li. 57.

demur (dē-mūr'), v.; pret. and pp. demurred, pp. demurring. [Early mod. E. also demurre; < ME. demorren, demorren, demoren, < OF. demorer, demorer, demurer, demurer, F. demurer = *Pr. The principal silver coin of the Romans under the empire. It was first minted in 260 or 250 B. C., when it weighed 75 grains; the weight was shortly afterward reduced to 60 grains troy. The obverse bore the helmeted head of Roma and the mark of value, X—that is, ten asses; the reverse, Caesar and Pallas. Other mythological and historical types were substituted under the later republic. The denarii of the empire bore the emperor's heads. About A. D. 215 the denarius was so debased that it contained only about 40 per cent. of pure silver, and it began to be supplanted about that time by the argenteus. In A. D. 296 Diocletian applied the name denarius to a copper coin issued by him. The value of the denarius under the republic and the earlier empire was about 17 cents. The denarius of Tiberius (see note on preceding page) is the penny of the New Testament (authorized version of 1611).

2. A Roman weight, the 86th or 94th of a Roman pound.—3. In English monetary reckoning, a penny, represented by the abbreviation d., the penny having been originally, like the Roman denarius, the largest silver coin: as, 6s. 8d. (six shillings and eight pence).

denaro (dē-nā'ro), n. [It., var. of denario, < L. denarius: see denarius.] An old Italian money of account; also, a weight. As a money, the denaro was the twelfth part of the soldo—that is, on the average, about the twelfth part of a United States cent. As a weight, the denaro varied in different localities from 17 to 30 grains Troy.
